Subject: [big campaign] Follow-up Materials from Background Briefing on the Chamber's Foreign Funding, fyi

U.S. Chamber & Foreign Funding Resources:

I. The original exclusive ThinkProgress post on the Chamber's foreign funding.

II. The latest ThinkProgress post: Inconvenient Facts That The Chamber Hasn't Refuted .

III. Today's Progress Report , "The Chamber's Foreign Influence," detailing the situation and the facts.

IV. U.S. Chamber Watch's site at www.fixtheuschamber.org . Contact Samantha Brown at bsamantha@gmail.com for more information on the Chamber's activities, including a full list of attack ads the Chamber has run and is running and the Chamber's endorsements.

V. A press call tomorrow at 1:30 p.m. with ThinkProgress' Faiz Shakir and Lee Fang and Senator Al Franken, who has publicly called for an investigation of the Chamber's foreign funding.

Call info: (877) 210 – 8943 Conference ID: 16738967

VI. The Facts on the Chamber's Foreign Funding (see below).

WHAT WE KNOW…

- CHAMBER AGRESSIVELY FUNDRAISING OVERSEAS FOR GENERAL FUNDS. The Chamber has received hundreds of thousands of dollars—if not millions—in foreign donations from countries like Bahrain, Abu Dhabi (U.A.E.), India, Russia, China, and elsewhere following an aggressive public fundraising campaign. ThinkProgress has identified several foreign entities created by, run by, or affiliated with the Chamber that return hundreds of thousands of dollars annually to the Chamber's general fund. Some of these corporations are even state-owned entities controlled by foreign governments. To recap, we know of at least three ways the Chamber takes in foreign money:
    - Direct contributions from the foreign firms, such as BP or Siemens, that are among its 300,000 members.
    - Direct contributions from foreign firms under the auspices of "Business Councils" located in various foreign countries. Our investigation has discovered that the U.S.-Bahrain Business Council and U.S.-India Business Council have raised at least $300,000 in such direct contributions to the Chamber.
    - Indirect contributions from foreign firms who belong to their local "AmCham," which itself in turn pays dues to the U.S. Chamber's general account.
- CHAMBER RUNNING $75 MILLION ATTACK CAMPAIGN AGAINST DEMS USING GENERAL FUNDS. As of September 15, the Chamber has spent more than $6.7 million to run more than 8,000 ads on behalf of GOP Senate candidates alone. A new round of highly misleading ads began targeting House members this week. The Chamber says it will spend some $75 million on this year's election—paid for out of the same general fund that the foreign money is going into.
- CHAMBER DISCUSSING IMPORTANCE OF 2010 ELECTION TO FOREIGN ENTITIES. To galvanize foreign businesses, the Chamber has commissioned former Ambassador Frank Lavin — who served as the McCain-Palin Asia campaign director and has appeared on television multiple times recently saying a Democratic Congress is bad for business — to speak before various foreign Chamber affiliates to talk about the stakes for the 2010 midterm elections.
- WE'VE SEEN THIS MOVIE BEFORE. The Chamber was exposed for having secretly taken approximately $20 million from the health insurance industry, which it then used to launch anti-health reform ads against Democrats. More recently, the Chamber, which receives money from BP, called on taxpayers to help foot the bill for BP's oil disaster in the Gulf. Another secret $1 million in funding from Fox News' parent corporation was also recently uncovered.

WHAT THE CHAMBER SAYS…

- ADMITS TO TAKING FOREIGN FUNDS. "The Chamber is proud to have global companies among our membership."

- TRUST, DON'T VERIFY. The Chamber denies the allegations and claims they have "a system" in place. As the New York Times notes today: "Money, however, is fungible, and it is impossible for an outsider to know whether the group is following its rules."
  - When pressed further to explain whether foreign funds are going into the same fund used for the political attack ads, the Chamber didn't deny that that was the case and once again refused to answer basic questions: "We don't feel obligated to answer that question because we follow all applicable law, and no foreign money funds our voter education activities."

WHAT THE LAW SAYS…

- ILLEGAL FOR FOREIGN ENTITIES AND INDIVIDUALS TO SPEND IN AMERICAN ELECTIONS. Under the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA), it is illegal for "foreign nationals" to "directly or indirectly" contribute, donate, or spend funds in connection with any federal, state, or local election in the U.S.

- ILLEGAL FOR AMERICAN ENTITIES—LIKE THE CHAMBER—TO SOLICIT FOREIGN FUNDS FOR AMERICAN ELECTIONS. As MoveOn's letter to the Department of Justice noted: "It is not only unlawful for a foreign national to make such a contribution, directly or indirectly, it is also unlawful for anyone "to solicit, accept or receive" such a contribution "from a foreign national." 2 U.S.C. §441e(a)(2)."

CALLS FOR INVESTIGATION…

- MOVEON. MoveOn sent a letter to the Department of Justice Tuesday requesting that it began an immediate investigation of the Chamber's potentially illegal activities. MoveOn has also launched a petition calling for the investigation and its members are calling on local TV stations to immediately take down the Chamber's ads.

- SENATOR FRANKEN. Senator Al Franken wrote to the Federal Election Commission Tuesday and requested that they too began an immediate investigation, as well close certain loopholes that could allow foreign spending in American elections.

PERRIELLO GETS AHEAD OF POTENTIAL FOREIGN MONEY IN HIS DISTRICT…

- Rep. Tom Perriello held a conference call with reporters Tuesday night to denounce foreign money in American elections:
  - "This latest move is beyond outrageous, to being fundamentally un-American and undemocratic." [Lynchburg News & Advance, 10/5]
  - "On Tuesday, Perriello called on his opponent Sen. Robert Hurt to stand-up against what he calls an 'organization with shadow funding'." [WDJB-TV, 10/5]

SECRET MONEY THREATENS TO DROWN OUT REAL PEOPLE'S VOICES…

- Secret money from corporate special interests — foreign and domestic — threatens to drown out the voices and concerns of everyday Americans. Right-wing third-party groups are preparing to spend a whopping $400 MILLION, much of it from secret sources, to buy our election. The American people — not special interests — should decide our elections.

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/15/upshot/hillary-clintons-chipotle-order-above-average.html?smid=tw-nytimes&abt=0002&abg=1&_r=0

On Monday, Hillary Rodham Clinton ordered a burrito bowl at a Chipotleoutside Toledo, Ohio.

Let others deconstruct her apparent anonymity or how her visit comparedwith President Obama's. Here's what The Upshot can contribute: Is Mrs. Clinton's order like the normal Chipotle meals of everyday Americans, or is it polarizing?

(Elsewhere in Monday's news: Russia may start selling a missile defense system to Iran; Marco Rubio is running for president; the United States may not have followed its own rules regarding drone strikes intended to minimize casualties. So ask yourself: Are you sure you need to be reading this?)

Our knowledge about what is normal and what is not comes from about 3,000 online orders from GrubHub, which some colleagues and I used to find out what people actually order at Chipotle. (All the data is online, by the way, so you also could have done this crucial analysis.)

Hillary Clinton, Just an Unrecognized Burrito Bowl Fan at ChipotleAPRIL 13, 2015

At the time of this writing, much about Mrs. Clinton's order was still unknown. We do know that it was a chicken bowl (with guacamole, according to ABC News). Less known, but critical: Did she get rice and beans, which are free with the order? What about fajita vegetables, or more than one kind of salsa? Even more important, from a calorie perspective: Did she include cheese and sour cream? This information, much like the contents of some of her emails when she was secretary of state, we may never know.

At Chipotle, How Many Calories Do People Really Eat?

How healthy are the meals people actually order for themselves at Chipotle? We decided to try to find out.

For this exercise, let's assume she ordered both rice and beans, as most people do, and included one salsa — let's say the fresh tomato salsa, the most popular. Then we'll assume she ordered either sour cream or cheese, but not both. Shredded cheese is the mild favorite among the masses, but more important, it's also my preference, and if Mrs. Clinton is going to get my vote, she's going to have to prove that she's just like me. (Nutritionally, the difference between them won't affect the math too much.) Also, lettuce. Almost everyone orders lettuce! I have proof. And, of course, the side of guacamole, which is not free.

So here's our potentially presidential order: chicken bowl, white rice, black beans, fresh garden salsa, shredded cheese, lettuce and guacamole.

According to Chipotle's nutritional calculator, this comes to 840 calories, 11.5 grams of saturated fat and 1,720 milligrams of sodium.

Congratulations - you have done more research on Hilary's Chipotle lunch than all the Mainstream Media did combined on Benghazi.

Answer: Mrs. Clinton's order was healthier than the average American's order, with significantly fewer calories, saturated fat and sodium than most orders do. Specifically, almost 75 percent of meals ordered at Chipotle had more calories than Mrs. Clinton's; about 75 percent had more sodium; and about 70 percent had more saturated fat.

Photo
The nutritional information of the potentially presidential Chipotle order.

As it happens, Mr. Obama also seems to prefer Chipotle orders with many fewer calories than is typical. When he visited one in June 2014, he ordered a burrito bowl with white rice and guacamole, sparing himself the 300 calories that come automatically with every Chipotle tortilla.

CONTINUE READING THE MAIN STORY28COMMENTS

If Mrs. Clinton (or Mr. Obama) had ordered sour cream, it would add about 115 calories, 7 grams of saturated fat and 30 milligrams of sodium, making the meal more "normal" but still with fewer calories than 65 percent of meals.

Put another way, the order is kind of normal — but really, who are we kidding? It's way better than average.

You may resume your lives.

Only after 8 years of Bush-Cheney neo-con, "shoot first, ask questions later" foreign policy could a Candidate for Vice-President of the United States matter-of-factly threaten war with nuclear power Russia -- and it not be a bigger deal.

"When asked by [ABC News's Charlie] Gibson if under the NATO treaty, the U.S. would have to go to war if Russia again invaded Georgia, [Sarah] Palin responded: "Perhaps so. I mean, that is the agreement when you are a NATO ally, is if another country is attacked, you're going to be expected to be called upon and help." [ABC News, 9/11/08]

Somewhere even Dick Cheney is saying, "Whoa."

In the same interview, Governor Palin, who is vying to be one step removed from the "red button," did not know what the Bush Doctrine of pre-emptive war is – a policy she ought to be extremely familiar with as her partner Senator John McCain promises "there will be other wars ," wants to keep U.S. troops policing an Iraqi civil war for '100 years' or more, and asininely jokes about "bomb, bomb, bomb, bomb bomb[ing]" Iran:

Palin Didn't Know What the Bush Doctrine Was

Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

Charles Gibson just asked Sarah Palin what she thought of the Bush Doctrine. Here's the transcript as best as I can make it out.

> Gibson: do you agree with the bush doctrine?
> Palin: in what respect, Charlie?
> Gibson: well, what do you interpret it to be?
> Palin: His world view?
> Gibson: the Bush doctrine, in September 2002, before the Iraq war.
> Palin: I believe that what president bush has attempted to do is rid this world of Islamic terrorists who are hell-bent in destroying our nation. There have been blunders along the way, though. there have been mistakes made, and with new leadership, and that's the beauty of American elections, of course, and democracy, is with new leadership comes opportunity to do
> Gibson: the bush doctrine is we have the right of self-defense, preemptive strike against any country we think is going to attack us. do you agree with us?

Clearly Palin did not have the foggiest idea what Gibson meant. This is absolutely huge. The Bush doctrine of preemption and the National Security Strategy of 2002 was the central element of debate for almost 2 years in the foreign policy community and in the country during the run up to the invasion of Iraq and in the years after. It was probably the single greatest shift in U.S. foreign policy in a generation.

There were pages and pages of ink spilled on this and it took up hours of debate. It was a central issue in the 2004 campaign. For her to not know what it is, raises serious questions about her experience and preparation to potentially be the leader of the free world.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Main Topics: Georgia-Russia war, Jerome Corsi book

Summary of Shift:

The Russian Georgian conflict remains the primary subject of the political news cycle. In the past three days, there has been a steady increase in the number of voices challenging the traditional media's narrative that McCain has leverage when speaking about Georgia. For example, on CNN Errol Louis remarked on the conflict of interest Scheunemann poses for McCain. In the same segment, Politico's Beth Frerking contradicted herself by first emphatically praising McCain's response to the crisis, then minutes later stating, "the last thing we need right now is saber rattling." The aggressive effort by progressive organizations to rebut Jerome Corsi has succeeded to the extent that media voices are almost all framing the book as negative, fairly inaccurate, 'swift boating.' On several networks, liberal pundits hammered Cori's erroneous claims and history of bigoted comments. Finally in political coverage, some time was devoted to unions attacking WalMart for coercing employees to vote Republican and lengthy segments were devoted to the news that Hillary Clinton will receive a roll call vote at the Democratic Convention.

In other news, there were segments about allegations that a Chinese athlete lied about her age in the Olympics and mechanical problems with Obama's plane. The broadcast networks continue to more or less favorably cover new drilling options (shale, North Dakota, offshore) with tepid mentions of environmental concerns or the long-term impact on climate change.

1. Jerome Corsi Book Discussed
   a. MSNBC: Maddow and guest eviscerate Corsi, claims in book, footnotes, publisher
   b. MSNBC: Del Walters says Corsi's book is literary equivalent to asking 'do you still beat your wife?'

Highlights, No Clips:

1. FNC: O'Reilly and Rove discuss 'bump' in polls for McCain because of Georgia-Russia war
2. CNN: RICK WARREN: [Obama's] not a Muslim and both of these men you know to my understanding are Christians. They're not evangelicals. That's an important point. I don't think either of them are necessarily evangelicals.

Maddow Attacks Jerome Corsi, Publisher, Evaluates The Various Charges Against The Book
(MSNBC 08/14/08 8:40pm)

RACHEL MADDOW: This Sunday when the New York Times publishes its list of best selling books, the Obama Nation by Jerome Corsi will debut at number one in nonfiction. The subtitle leftist politics and the cult of personality is published by Threshold Positions, a subdivision of Simon and Shuster – the chief editor of the imprint is former Dick Cheney adviser Mary Matalin. Best seller or not, the assertions in Corsi's book, and the cast of characters surrounding its publication, stretched the credulity of its classification of nonfiction. If the name of Jerome Corsi is familiar to you, its probably because of his role in concocting wild lies about John Kerry's war record in 2004 [...] You may also remember Corsi's apology for the word raghead to describe Muslims on the website FreeRepublic. He also apologized for using the phrase boy bumpers, though I still have no idea what that was all about. You may remember Corsi for his sober allegations that Hillary Clinton is a lesbian, that John Kerry is both a Jew and a Communist, and his allegations that Muslims actually worship Satan. You may remember Corsi for his recent book attacking the liberal myth that oil is a finite resource. Since he, Jerome Corsi, has learned how to make new oil. You may remember Corsi for his scholarly rebuke of George Bush's secret plan to merge the United States into Mexico. [...]

ERIC BURNS: [...] One of the things that gives a book cache, a nonfiction book, is footnotes. You look at the back of the book, all these footnotes, dozens of pages, and you say this guy did a lot of research. Well, before the show tonight, and I didn't have time to do more [...] but of the first 11 footnotes in the book, nine of the-in nine of them, Corsi quotes Corsi. In other words, he quotes previous writings of his own. [...] It's a dubious practice to say the least. [...]

BURNS: Bulk sales means instead of an individual going into buy the book, an organization buys dozens of books, hundreds of books, maybe even thousands of books. What this means is the whole picture of the book's popularity is skewed. What has happened here, this isn't my opinion, and I'll tell you why it's not my opinion in just a minute, but what has happened is that several conservative groups have bought large numbers of they're giving them out to fellow conservatives or for all I know they're putting them on the shelves somewhere. The New York Times, recognizing this, will put the book at number one on the best seller list this week with a dart next to it. The dart means bulk sales, you can't trust the figures.

Del Walters: Corsi's Book is Literary Equivalent to Asking: Do You Still Beat Your Wife? (MSNBC 08/14/08 07:56pm)
DEL WALTERS: I think the problem with that particular book it is the political, the literary equivalence to do you still beat your wife. I talked to Kathleen Kennedy Townsend one time, and she said that now a days in politics you not only have to be prepared to respond to your record and your reputation but also all the things they may say about you that have absolutely no basis in fact. The problem with these books are they print them. Someone is going to see it on a newsstand and they are going to say you know there's a whole book about this. And then they are going to look at the back of it and say well look at the publishing company that published it. And they are going to say there must be some fire there because there is an awful lot of smoke. It may be completely true, and that is what the Obama campaign is trying to do. But how do you answer all of those charges, how do you say that I don't beat my wife anymore, I never beat my wife? Well people are going to say, if you do then you protest too much, and if you don't then they are going to say well there must be a grain of truth there. I think that this thing is very, very troubling.

DAVID SCHUSTER: [...] Corsi is, as described by the Obama spokesperson, a discredited liar who is peddling another piece of garbage in order to continue the Bush, Cheney politics. [...]

MICHELLE BERNARD: [...] He's absolutely got to respond to them, because people know John McCain, people are still trying to figure out who Barack Obama is and that's why this book was published when it was. [...]

Cavuto Challenges Holtz-Eakin On McCain's Budget Plan, Reconciling Spending And Tax Cuts (FNC 08/14/08 4:20pm)
NEIL CAVUTO: The gist of this is we have to find a way to pay for our government. And things have gotten pretty crazy over the years so who better to sort of balance that within the folks who've benefitted - the rich. What do you make of it?

DOUG HOLTZ-EAKIN: Let's be clear what's going on here. Senator Obama has a long and very clear record of voting 94 times in his career as a Senator for higher taxes. That includes a vote when he was claiming he wanted to cut taxes for people under 250,000 going back to the Senate and voting for higher taxes for people with 200,00...

CAVUTO: Well, be careful. Your guy is hardly the virgin mary on this issue. He was against the President's tax cuts for good reason at the time, so he too has changed his position on it.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Let us also remember that Senator Obama has proposed a million dollars in earmarks for every year he's been a working Senator. So, what goes on when he hits the campaign drill? You know his record as well as anyone. He says he will take public financing, then he explains to his supporters no. He says he'll do town halls with John McCain, but he doesn't appear in any.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CAVUTO: No, no, no. Let's stick to the tax issue [cross talk] this is important. We have a candidate who claims the opponent, the Democratic opponent is a tax hiker, yet we have a candidate in your guy, John McCain, who cannot account for his spending with his aggressive tax cuts he's planning. Which goes? Which is real?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: John McCain ran on a tax cut in 2000. He has a proven record he has never voted for any kind of tax increase in his life - he would not support Barack Obama's policies.

CAVUTO: But he's also saying he's not ruling out the possibility of having to raise taxes. He's not a do or die on that issue right?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: He has said, and this came up in the context of Social Security, that he understands negotiations, he understands how it gets done in the Congress, you have to let everyone bring their proposals to the table.

CAVUTO: That sounds to be that he's open to tax hike. Your criticizing the Obama folks for stating it, you're hinting at it.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: No. That is saying they could send their bad ideas to the table. That's their right. He will bring his ideas to the table: controlling spending, lower taxes, jobs for American workers,

Louis Invokes Scheunemann In Discussing McCain And Obama Response To Georgia-Russia War (CNN 08/14/08 7:43pm)
BETH FRERKING, POLITICO: This is a sweet spot for John McCain. He's looked extremely authoritative. He's looked very relaxed and confident whenever he's spoken about this. I think that's obviously to his advantage. [...]

ERROL LOUIS: I think there are some problems with John McCain on all this stuff. I certainly don't buy into the hype that he's saying all the right things. If you consider that his top foreign policy adviser until 90 days ago was a paid client of the Georgian government. If you consider that John McCain – and that client is now calling in his favor- Saakashvili is now calling in his favor, what we need now is action, not just words. I mean he's expecting him now as a candidate or even as President to try to pull the cat out of the fire. You know the mixture of private and public aims is not particularly attractive [...]

FRERKING: Probably the smartest thing for all of them to do is wait and watch, talk about their concerns, talk about the concerns of the American people, watching, I think the last thing we need right now is saber rattling given that we have troops in Afghanistan and Iraq. I think the smartest thing to do is be counted and be seen.

Phil Gramm Spotted at McCain Event (MSNBC 08/14/08 07:59pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: Someone that was seen with John McCain today, you may remember Phil Gramm and some comments that he made several seeks ago that John McCain quickly distanced himself from. [...]

[Clip of Gramm's Comments]

SHUSTER: Now John McCain very quickly distanced himself from Phil Gramm but there was Phil Gramm today at a John McCain event. The picture of Phil Gramm in the audience with John McCain. I mean at a certain point don't the democrats, they didn't run an ad on Phil Gramm, aren't they essentially giving John McCain a free pass on this. And that would suggest that John McCain isn't as tough as he needs to be.

MICHELLE BERNARD: He's got to be careful to be the agent of change, but he's also got to go negative if he wants to win.

Highlight #5
Gordon Smith, One in a Long Line of Senators Abandoning McCain and the Convention (MSNBC 8/14/08 08:14pm)
RACHEL MADDOW: Senator John McCain is finding himself bereft of buddies this summer. Republican Senator Gordon Smith of Oregon is the latest runaway; he has quit as state co-chair for McCain's campaign. Smith insists he is not trying to distance himself from the presumptive nominee. He says he's merely focusing his efforts on his own reelection campaign. But considering the position of co-chair is mainly honorary requiring little more from Senator Smith than the use of his name, and considering Senator Smith has been running re-election ads linking himself both to Senator John Kerry and Senator Barack Obama, even though in 04' he called Kerry French and socialist, the claim that Smith isn't trying to separate himself from McCain and from the R after his own title, rings a little hollow. Senator Smith just the latest in a string of GOP Senators to back away from McCain and the GOP. [...]

BOB HERBERT: Who's going to be there? He's going to be a lonely guy.

MADDOW: Isn't this weird? 10 out of 49 Republican Senators. Almost a fifth are not going. [to the GOP Convention]

HERBERT: The short answer is this is weird. The Republican's are demoralized, the Republican's in congress are demoralized, and they have reason to be demoralized. Things are really turning against them. They don't have the issues; they are running away from Bush, who was incredibly unpopular. McCain has turned out not to be a great candidate. [...] That conservative to the right philosophy has pretty much played out, it's bankrupt now. [...]

MADDOW: [...] Heading into the general election campaign how would McCain strategize against the Democrats casting him too close to Bush. [...] With all of these defections, not only form the convention but from McCain personally, is are Republicans making a distinction between McCain and Bush. Do these defections represent an assessment by Republican Senators that running away from McCain is the same thing as running away from Bush and has the same political imperative.

HERBERT: Yea I think that's what's going on. The ones that are running away are definitely assuming that the voters are going to see McCain linked up there with Bush. [...]

If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:

Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.

- Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
- Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.
- Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
- Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.
- Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.
- And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.

Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: "Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year's Liberty Medal." [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation's standing in the world.

- Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: "I will tell you that I'm the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I'm not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I'm not going to start now. It's just – 'til death do us part." [CNN interview]

ANDERSON COOPER: Welcome.
BERNIE SANDERS: It's good to be with you.
ANDERSON COOPER: So, you have had, obviously, quite a few days -- it's been quite a whirlwind for you. I understand your campaign says you've raised at least $3 million since Iowa. I'm wondering, out there, in New Hampshire today, what are you feeling? What sort of momentum - are you Feeling The Bern?
BERNIE SANDERS: We're feeling great. Yes, I am, now that you ask. We're feeling really great. I think the message that we are bringing forth is resonating with the American people. And you talked about money - one of the things that has happened in our campaign, Anderson, which has blown me away, it really has, is that we have received 3.5 million individual contributions. That is more than any candidate in the history of the United States up until this point, and you know what the average contribution is?
ANDERSON COOPER: $27.
BERNIE SANDERS: Hey, you heard! And that's pretty – and in a day of Super PACs, where people are raising huge amounts of money from Wall Street and the drug companies, the fact that millions of individual contributions from working people and the middle class who want us to go forward, and to transform this country in very significant ways, is very moving to me.
ANDERSON COOPER: I'm just going to ask a couple of questions, and then we'll really going to get it over to the audience. There is an expectations game being played. And we've been seeing this from both campaigns in New Hampshire. Hillary Clinton's campaign keeps pointing to the fact that you're from a neighboring state; that you're way up in the polls. Are you still an underdog?
BERNIE SANDERS: Of course we're an underdog. We are taking on the most powerful political organization in the country. And that's, you know, the Clinton organization. Secretary Clinton, obviously, ran here in 2008 and she won. Her husband ran here several times before that. So this is her fourth campaign in that family [ph] here in New Hampshire. It is clear that many people in New Hampshire do know me, because I come from a neighboring state. And I think we have support, because people over the years have seen the work that I am doing in standing up for working families and the middle class. But in general, we started this campaign nationally, as you well know, 40, 50 points behind Secretary Clinton. We had no money, we had no organization, and we had relatively little name recognition. I think it's fair to say, we have come a pretty long way in the last nine months.

ANDERSON COOPER: you are -- i mean, according to the latest cnn poll, you're up some 23 points, some people say or believe here in new hampshire. obviously, we know polls can get it wrong. how do you not underperform here? because there is an expectation --

BERNIE SANDERS: because that's the media game! that's what media talks about. who cares? the point is, underperform -- the point is, we're going to work as hard as we can to win. and after we do hopefully well here, we're going to go on to nevada and then south carolina and do as well as we can all over this country. i got to say, in all due respect, that's media stuff. over, you know, i think some of these polls --

ANDERSON COOPER: you don't look at polls, your campaign?

BERNIE SANDERS: sure we do, but some of these polls are off the charts. i mean, we're not -- i think this is going to be a very close election here in new hampshire.

ANDERSON COOPER: there's been some back and forth on the campaign trail today about, is Hillary Clinton a progressive? we're going to get to that later on, because we've got some questions from the audience about that and some other questions. but senator barbara boxer, a supporter of Clinton, came back, fired back basically at your campaign today, at you, saying, of course Hillary Clinton is a progressive, and asked, you know, is -- that bernie sanders is a democrat on some days. you had said that Hillary Clinton is a progressive on some days. is that fair? because there are some democrats who -- i mean, in your heart, are you a democrat?

BERNIE SANDERS: sure. i have made a decision to run for the democratic nomination to be president of the united states. i was, for 16 years, in the house democratic caucus, for 9 years in the senate democratic caucus. right now, i am the ranking member of the budget committee, appointed by the democratic leadership and membership. a couple of years ago, i was very proudly the chairman of the senate veterans committee. so, of course i am a democrat. i am running for the democratic nomination. in terms of secretary Clinton, and i know the media is kind of making a big deal about this, all that i said, which is simply true, is, i think it was in november in ohio, you may recall this --

ANDERSON COOPER: yes.

BERNIE SANDERS: i don't know the context of it, but secretary Clinton said, "some people call me a" -- i'm paraphrasing. some people call me a moderate, and i proudly, you know, say that i am a moderate. that's what she said. so what all i said is, you can't say you're a moderate on one day and be a progressive on another day. some of my best friends are moderates. i love moderates, but you can't be a moderate and a progressive. they are different.

ANDERSON COOPER: We'll talk more about that, but I want to go to our first guest. Chris Brownell, he's an office administrator in Nashua. He says he's leaning towards supporting you, but he's got some questions about your tax policies.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Senator Sanders, the first thing I hear about you is that you're going to raise taxes on the middle class. I support my family on a salary of $41,000 a year. I'm wondering if you raise my taxes, how does that help me?

BERNIE SANDERS: Can I stand up?

ANDERSON COOPER: You can do whatever you want.

BERNIE SANDERS: Okay. Chris, thanks very much for that good question. This is what we are going to do. The United States is the only major country on earth that doesn't guarantee health care to all people and we end up spending far, far more per capita on health care, as do the people of any other country, Canada, UK, France, whatever. What we are going to fight for is a Medicare for all single-payer program. Which would provide comprehensive health care to your family and every family in America. So, let me tell you what we do. We raise your taxes if you're somewhere in the middle of the economy, about 500 bucks, but you know what we're going to do? For health care, we're going to reduce your health care costs by $5,000. So you're going to pay a little bit more in taxes, but you're no longer going to have to pay private health insurance premiums. Now, I've been criticized for this. But I believe that health care is a right of all people, that we should not have these deductibles and co-payments. We should not be paying the highest prices in the world for prescription drugs, and our Medicare-for-all program will guarantee comprehensive care to all people and save middle class families some thousands of dollars a year.

ANDERSON COOPER: Chris, let me just ask you, does that math work for you?
AUDIENCE MEMBER: I mean, if it saves me on health insurance premiums, I will gladly pay more taxes.
BERNIE SANDERS: See, and Chris, what happens in politics -- I don't want to shock anybody in the office -- sometimes people distort things. I've had 30-second ads run against me years ago – “Bernie is going to raise your taxes!” But they forget to say, we're going to do away with your private insurance premiums. Bottom line here is, we spend almost three times more per person than the British, 50% more than the French. We can save substantial sums of money and my Medicare for all system is funded in a very progressive way. Yes, you'll pay a little bit more, but your health premiums will disappear.
ANDERSON COOPER: That's assuming you can get that through, though.

BERNIE SANDERS: Well, that's – you know, that's, that’s true. But all of what I am trying to do assumes something. When I talk about making public colleges and universities tuition-free, and doing that, and paying for that through a tax on Wall Street speculation, when I talk about rebuilding our crumbling infrastructure – which, as you know, is in disrepair all over this country – and talk about doing away with huge loopholes that major corporations now enjoy, so that in a given year you have these large corporations making billions, not paying a nickel the taxes, because they're putting their money in the Cayman Islands – now, how do we get these things through? What this campaign is about is not just electing a president; it is creating a political revolution, where millions of people – many of whom have not been involved in the political process – stand up and demand a government which represents all of us, not just wealthy campaign contributors. That's how we make change.
ANDERSON COOPER: Let me ask you – when you use – when you use the term "revolution," it makes some people nervous. What's wrong with evolution?
BERNIE SANDERS: Well, I think what we – you know, we had the – remember the Reagan revolution and the Gingrich revolution? Well, my revolution is a little bit different. But it is a process. Look, let's be clear: we have one of the lowest voter turnouts of any major country on Earth. In the last election, where Republicans won a huge victory, 63% of the American people didn't vote. 80% of young people didn't vote. Now, when people don't vote, there's a political vacuum that's created, and I will tell you how it's filled: it's filled by lobbyists and campaign contributors who could care less about the middle class, who are there to protect the wealthiest people in this country. So what we are trying to do – and I would tell you, Anderson, with some success – is bring working people and young people and lower income people into the political process. And when that happens, you know what? We will raise the minimum wage, we will have health care for all people, we will make public colleges and universities tuition-free.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Jason Telerski, he’s in IT management – he’s in IT management, he says you are his dream candidate, but he does have some concerns.

BERNIE SANDERS: “But’s” always make me nervous. Alright Jason, fire away.

JASON TELERSKI (AUDIENCE MEMBER): You are my dream candidate in a lot of ways. The message of your campaign really speaks to me. And on some issues I feel like you actually speak for me. But I also know that a lot of people don’t have the same class-based view of the world that I do and I think you do as well. I’ve seen all of your debates and I just don’t see you connecting with people that view the world through a religious or racial lens – people that see those as the powerful forces in our society. I’m wondering what you can do to better engage with the broader electorate, to understand – to understand their points of view – demonstrate that you can be a better leader for them.

BERNIE SANDERS: Very good question and thank you for it. We are reaching out as strongly as we can, for example, to the African American community and to the Latino community. And I think we are gaining more and more support in those communities for a couple of reasons. Number one, within the African American community, it’s not only an economic issue – raising the minimum wage and providing jobs – youth unemployment for African American kids now is 51%. So those are important issues. But I will tell you what else is an important issue and that is the criminal justice issue. That fact that we have more people in jail than any other country, disproportionately African American and Latino. That fact that Blacks and whites do marijuana at about an equal level and yet four times more Blacks get arrested. The fact that Blacks are more likely to be stopped by police in a vehicle and get arrested than whites. Those are huge issues. And what I have said and repeat, to a virtually all-white state but I'll say this all over the country, there will be no president who will fight harder to end institutional racism than I will and we have got to reform a very, very broken criminal justice system. It breaks my heart, and I know it breaks the hearts of millions of people in this country, to see videos on television of unarmed people, often African Americans, shot by police. That has got to end and these are issues I take very seriously, Jason.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want to follow up, because Jason also mentioned faith, which is something you've spoken a little bit about. You're Jewish, but you say you're not actively involved in organized religion. What do you say to a voter out there who says, and who sees faith as a guiding principle in their lives and want it to be a guiding principle in this country?
BERNIE SANDERS: It's a guiding principle in my life. Absolutely, it is. Now, everybody practices religion in a different way. To me, I would not be here tonight, I would not be running for president of the United States if I did not have very strong religious and spiritual feelings. I believe that as a human being, the pain that one person feels, if we have children who are hungry in America, if we have elderly people who can't afford their prescription drugs, you know what? That impacts you, that impacts me. And I worry very much about a society where some people spiritually say, "It doesn't matter to me, I got it, I don't care about other people." So my spirituality is that we are all in this together and that when children go hungry, when veterans sleep out on the street, it impacts me. That's my very strong spiritual belief.
ANDERSON COOPER: Senator, I want you to meet Denise Bernard, she was wounded in the Boston Marathon bombing. She says she's undecided. She's got a question about terrorism.
AUDIENCE MEMBER: Yes, I am a fortunate survivor from the Boston bombing, and it has changed my life. And one of the biggest things is participating in events, large events, and I'm running the marathon again –
BERNIE SANDERS: Good for you.
AUDIENCE MEMBER: --this year with my husband. And our children are gonna be out there. Thank you. [Applause.]
Thank you. So my kids are gonna be out there spectating and I can only think about their safety while they're out there, so my question to you is what are your plans keeping us safe from terrorism?

BERNIE SANDERS: Okay. For a start, in my view, we have got to crush ISIS, for a start. And as somebody who voted against the war in Iraq, what i believe is we've got to learn the lessons of that war. So we have to destroy ISIS, but we have to be not just tough, we have to be smart. And that means, we work with a large coalition, led by on the ground Muslim troops. King Abdullah of Jordan made the point, it will be Muslim troops who will destroy ISIS, because ISIS has hijacked their religion. The United States, the UK, France, Germany, Russia provide support, in my view, to the troops on the ground. So we've got to crush them. Internally, what we have got to do is significantly improve intelligence and i think we are not as strong as we can be in communicating with intelligence agencies all over this country. If people come into this country, they have got to be screened -- i happen to believe that we should accept refugees from the Middle East, from Syria and Afghanistan, but i also appreciate the concern that others have, that we have got to screen those people, absolutely, thoroughly. There needs to be better coordination between federal, state, and local police. We have to work, which is very hard, making sure that we are tracking internet transmission of information, where ISIS has been successful in getting information out of recruiting people. But your concerns -- and again, thank you, you're a symbol of courage, that you went through that horror in Boston and you're going back and running again. Thank you for your courage.
ANDERSON COOPER: I wanted to just follow up, just briefly on that. There is a disconnect. Democrats in Iowa who said that terrorism was the most important issue for them, they back Secretary Clinton over you by 37 points. Why do you think that is? Why do you think they see her as more ready to handle that?

ANDERSON COOPER: I wanted to just follow up, just briefly, on that. There is a disconnect. Democrats in Iowa who said that terrorism was the most important issue for them, they backed Secretary Clinton over you by 37 points. Why do you think that is? Why do you think they see her as more ready to handle that?
BERNIE SANDERS: Well, I think because she has a great deal of experience. She was secretary of state of our country for four years. But I would say, Anderson, that the key foreign policy vote in modern American history was whether or not we should go into Iraq. And Secretary Clinton was in the Senate then, I was in the house then. We both listened to the same evidence. I made the decision, which I think history will conclude was the right decision, not to go to war. And if people want to go to my website, berniesanders.com , check out what I said in 2002. And it gives me no joy at all to say that much of what I feared would happen did, in fact, happen in terms of the destabilization of the region. So I think in terms of foreign policy, I have the judgment. We've been all over this world, met with foreign policy leaders and I am confident that we can assemble a team that would do a great job.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Gabrielle Graves, she's a student here in New Hampshire, she's an independent voter, but she's supporting you.

GABRIELLE GRAVES (VOTER): Hi. So I'm from Brooklyn, New York, like you are, and my question is that I've experienced and I've witnessed a lot of police brutality and racial unjustice [sic]. And I want to know, like, I think and I do believe that it is neighborhoods primarily of people of color, low-income neighborhoods that are disproportionately affected by unjust policing. And I want to know if you are to be elected as president of the United States, what would you do to enact change and combat this racial injustice?

BERNIE SANDERS: Gabrielle, you have asked an important question that is on the minds of millions of people, not just African-Americans, but all people. Here's what I would do. For a start. And I speak as a former mayor. I was mayor of Burlington, Vermont, as many know, who worked very closely with our police department, and believe that the vast majority of police officers in this country are hard-working, are honest, and are trying to do their best doing very, very difficult work. But if a police officer breaks the law, like any other public official, that police officer must be held accountable. That's number one. Number two, you have seen on television, as I have, local police departments that look like occupying armies. We have got to demilitarize local police departments, make them part of the community, not invading armies. Third -- third, and very importantly, we have got to make police departments look like the communities that they serve. So if there's a diverse community, the police department should reflect that diversity. Fourthly, in terms of police action, the federal -- police departments are run by local governments, but the federal government can play an important role in helping to fund model-type programs -- for example, I think we have to rethink the use of lethal force. I think, too often, lethal force goes first rather than last. Obviously, there are times when policeman must use their guns and use them as quickly as possible. But I think what we need to do is figure out ways to train police departments so that police officers, so that lethal force is the last resort, not the first resort. Those are some of the things I would do.

ANDERSON COOPER: i want to ask you, because i think people don't know much about your background on this subject. it's interesting, 54 years ago, you were on the front lines of trying to desegregate school housing at the university of chicago. you were even arrested –

BERNIE SANDERS: don't tell anybody that.

ANDERSON COOPER: what was it that motivated a 20-year-old white kid from brooklyn to do that?

BERNIE SANDERS: it's hard to say what motivates anybody. i think, as a kid, my parents weren't political. my brother was a little bit, i many parents were not. but, you know, like in any school, you see big kids picking on little kids, you know? and i resented that. i always did. and, you know, injustice bothered me very, very much. and when i went to the university of chicago, i had the opportunity to -- i wasn't a great student, i have to -- i have to admit it. in fact, i learned more off-campus -- i shouldn't say this to other students, though -- do your homework, study –

ANDERSON COOPER: got a lot of teachers in this room.

BERNIE SANDERS: but i learned a lot off of campus. i got involved in a group some may know, some may not, called the converse of racial equality. we got involved in a group trying to desegregate housing. we also got involved in efforts to desegregate the school system there and i got arrested. but i think, you know, as far back as i can remember, and anderson, i can't tell you why, but injustice is something that i have always fought throughout my life.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Keith Howard. He was a veteran, he was homeless after serving in the army. He's now the executive director of Liberty House, which is a transitional facility for former homeless vets. He says he's undecided. Keith, welcome.

QUESTION: Yeah, Senator Sanders, throughout this election cycle, we at Liberty House have been contacted by a number of republican presidential candidates. To date, we've not heard from any democrats. Have you ceded the support of veterans to the republicans? And if your answer is no, what is your evidence?

BERNIE SANDERS: What is my evidence? My evidence is that I'm the former chairman of the U.S. Senate committee on veterans' affairs. That I introduced along with the support of the American Legion, the VFW, the DAV, the Vietnam vets of virtually every major veterans organization, the most comprehensive veterans' health care legislation in the modern history of the united states of America.

And sadly enough, you know, it's one thing for republicans to talk about how much they love veterans. I got two republican votes on a comprehensive bill supported by virtually the entire veterans committee. But I didn't give up. What i did then is work with people like John McCain, Jeff Miller over in the House, and we passed -- wasn't my ideal bill, I compromised -- but it was the most significant piece of veterans health care legislation passed in modern history. We put some $16 billion into veterans' health care, as well as in taking care of veterans in a number of other areas.
So, it's easy for politicians to give speeches. But what my work in the senate has been involved is making sure that veterans in this country get the best quality health care possible, get their benefits when they need them, not wait years and years. And we've made some progress on that. Do our best to end veterans' homelessness, and President Obama put a lot of money into that, and we have had some success. Still have a way to go.
So I think if you check my record, it will tell you that i received the awards, the highest award, from the American Legion and the VFW for my work on veterans issues. So I'm proud of that.

COOPER: Let me follow up on that. You were on the Veterans Affairs committee for 8 years. You headed it for 2 years. There were 18 Inspectors General talking about problems plaguing the VA. Why did it take so long, and did it take you too long to act?

SANDERS: Fair question. And I think the answer is [INAUDIBLE]

QUESTION:
That might not share our deeply held goals in order to achieve a more perfect union?

BERNIE SANDERS: Marjorie, thank you for your question. It is just not accurate to say, I know some times people may portray me with this respect, it is not accurate to say it is this way or the highway. Let me give you some examples, I just mentioned that I compromised significantly with people like John McCain and Republicans in the House to pass what is regarded as the most significant piece of veterans' legislation passed in many, many years. Second of all, when I was in the House of Representatives, there were years Marjorie where I received more votes, I won more amendments than any other member of the House of Representatives because I reached out where there was common ground with Republicans. So I think I have a history of being able to work with Republicans when there is common ground. But here is the major point that I want to make, and I will continue to do that, but here is the truth and it is a unpleasant truth, and I know that not everybody here will agree with me. In my view, we have a Congress today that is much more interested in doing the bidding of the wealthy and the powerful, Wall Street, and the drug companies, and the fossil fuels industries rather than the needs of the American people. And I believe that we are not going to make the real changes that we need dealing with the grotesque level of wealth and income inequality – reforming a corrupt campaign finance system, which allows billionaires to buy elections dealing with climate change. Making sure we don't continue to pay the highest prices in the world for prescription drugs when last year the three major drug companies made 45 billion in profit [AUDIO GLITCH]. We've got to change all of that, well were we can we work with our Republican friends, but change in my view but history tells us has always come from the bottom on up – that's what the Civil Rights movement was about, that's what the women's movement was about, that's what the gay movement was about, that's what the environmental is about. And what we need right now is a very profound and deep movement in this country where millions of people in fact get involved and say, I'm sorry, my kid is not going to have to graduate a hundred thousand dollars in debt – that's wrong. My mom is entitled to decent health care and prescription drugs that she can't afford. Those are the kinds of movements that we need, and that's how we'll bring about real change in this country.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Mark Vines, [ph] he's a Boy Scout Master, he said he decided to support you in the primary. Your question.
MARK VINES: Good evening, Senator.
BERNIE SANDERS: That's because I was a Boy Scout too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MARK VINES: Good evening, Senator. Four of our last five presidents were elected and served two terms. Do you see any limitations for yourself in the ability to serve two terms to enact these sweeping changes that you envision for our country?
BERNIE SANDERS: I don't, Mark. You know, we'll take on term at a time. Got to get to the first term first.
ANDERSON COOPER: You would be 83 at the end of your second term.
BERNIE SANDERS: Well, you know, thank goodness - let's not be ageist here!
ANDERSON COOPER: I'm not, I'm not.
BERNIE SANDERS: You know, I am, thank god, in good health. And one can't predict the future, one never knows what happens tomorrow. But thank God I have - when I was a kid, I was a long-distance runner. I was not quite the marathon runner, but I was a cross-country runner. And I've had good endurance and good strength my whole life. so, you know, if I am fortunate enough to win the general election, and we do well, yes, I would like to run for re-election.
ANDERSON COOPER: You got a lot more energy than I do certainly. We're going to take a quick break. We're going to be right back with more audience questions for Senator Sanders. You're watching the CNN Democratic presidential town hall, live from New Hampshire.

ANDERSON COOPER: welcome back to the cnn democratic presidential town hall at the derry opera house in new hampshire. we're here with senator bernie sanders. let's continue the questions. i want to play for senator sanders a clip from hillary clinton's speech monday night after the iowa caucuses. let's listen.

HILLARY CLINTON SPEECH CLIP: here's what i want you to know. it is rare, it is rare that we have the opportunity we do now. to have a real contest of ideas. to really think hard about what the democratic party stands for and what we want the future of our country to look like if we do our part to build it. i am a progressive who gets things done for people.

ANDERSON COOPER: there were a lot of your supporters, who when they heard that, didn't think -- or expressed their belief that she's not a progressive. we talked about this a bit at the beginning. but just so we're clear, do you think that hillary clinton is a progressive?

BERNIE SANDERS: let me just say this. i have enormous respect for hillary clinton. i've known her for 25 years. and it's unfortunate in politics, and everybody should know this -- what media often want you to do, and you're asked this question, i'm sure it's the same for hillary clinton, "beat her up, tell me something terrible about her, attack her," because that will make the news. i have tried my best not to do that. you're looking at a guy who has been in politics a long time [applause] and i have never run a negative ad in my life. and i look forward to never running a negative ad in my life, okay? i don't think people deserve that. we have to -- as secretary clinton just said, that's what politics is about. it's a debate on the issues. secretary clinton has a long and distinguished public career. she has worked with children, when she began, and god only knows that we need a lot of work, given the fact that we have the highest rate of childhood poverty of any country on earth. so i respect her, i thought she did a good job as secretary of state. i served with her in the senate. we worked together on some issues. but there are other issues, anderson, where i think she is just not progressive. i do not know any progressive who has a super pac and takes $15 million from wall street. that's just not progressive. as i mentioned earlier, the key foreign policy vote of modern american history was the war in iraq. the progressive community was pretty united in saying, "don't listen to bush. don't go to war." secretary clinton voted to go to war. virtually all of the trade unions and millions of working people understand that our trade policies, nafta, cafta, permanent normal trade relations with china, et cetera, have been written by corporate america and the goal of it is to be able to throw american workers out on the street, move to china and other low-wage countries, and bring their products back into this country. and that's one of the reasons why the middle class of this country and the working class is struggling so hard. secretary clinton has been a supporter in the past of various trade policies, nafta and pmtr with china. reluctantly and after a lot of pressure on her, she came out against the tpp and i'm glad that she did. every sensible person understands that climate change is real, it is caused by human activity, and we have got to transform our energy system away from fossil fuel. for a long time, secretary clinton was talking about the benefits of the keystone pipeline. well, there are no benefits to excavating and transporting some of the dirtiest fossil fuel in the world. i was in the lead in opposition to the keystone pipeline. i'm in opposition to the pipeline right here in new hampshire and the pipeline in vermont. i think we have got to move aggressively away from fossil fuel if we're going to leave this planet in a way that's healthy and habitable for our kids. so those are just some of the areas. [applause]

ANDERSON COOPER: Just one quick follow-up to that. There's a new book called "Buyer's Remorse: How Obama Led Progressives Down," you gave it a ringing endorsement --
BERNIE SANDERS: No, I didn't give it an endorsement.
ANDERSON COOPER: Tell me what you did.
BERNIE SANDERS: I wrote a blurb for it, you may have the blurb there, and what the blurb said is that I think the next president should be very aggressive in bringing people into the political process. And that, I believe, from the bottom of my heart, and if elected president, that will be a top priority of mine.
ANDERSON COOPER: Did President Obama let progressives down?
BERNIE SANDERS: I think in some areas, progressive -- for example, in the trade area. Right now, I think they signed today the TPP in New Zealand. I think it is a continuation of bad trade policies. The president supports it, I strongly disagree with it. On the other hand, let's be very clear. And I got a little bit upset that our Republicans friends suffer from a very serious illness called amnesia. They forgot what the economy of this country was like seven years ago when we were losing 800,000 jobs a month, when we were running up a $1.4 trillion deficit, and by the way, the world's financial system was on the verge of collapse. President Obama and Vice President Biden have taken us a very, very long way from those dismal days. Are we where we want to be today? No. But we have come a long way and President Obama deserves an enormous amount of credit for that.
ANDERSON COOPER: Senator, as you know, in a recent poll, I'm sure, 88% of adults in New Hampshire said heroin abuse is a very serious problem in the state. I want you to meet David Cote, a recovery coach who's in long-term recovery himself. He says he's undecided, leaning towards you. David, thanks for being here. What's your question?

DAVID COTE: Thank you. Thank you, Senator, for hearing me. I come to you tonight as the father of a teenager. I have a young teenage daughter. And my biggest concern these days is the availability of opiates and other drugs, substances on the street, and the effects that they have on our youth and on our citizens. My question to you is, we're losing 129 people a day in this country. In the city of Manchester, we're losing one person a week at –
BERNIE SANDERS: Unbelievable.
DAVID COTE: You know, minimally. And my question to you is, if -- what would you do in order to secure recovery services for those that have slipped through the cracks of prevention and moved on to treatment?
BERNIE SANDERS: Thank you very much for your question. It is a crisis here in New Hampshire. And by the way, there's a crisis in Vermont. You may recall our governor gave his State of the Union speech a year ago on this issue. Because people think, well, New Hampshire and Vermont, these are rural states, not a problem. You're right, it is a terrible problem. What do we do? For a start, we understand that substance abuse and addiction is a health issue, not a criminal issue. And when I talk about moving toward universal health care, what I understand that to be – and it is absolutely imperative that it be – is understanding that mental health and addiction is part of health care. And what that means is that when people need treatment, they shouldn't have to wait three months. When they need it, they should be able to get it. So that means we need a revolution in this country in mental health care to address the causes of addiction and provide treatment. And I was to a treatment center in Manchester, which is kind of peer-oriented. Former people who had addiction work with other people. That's one approach. There are many other approaches. But the bottom line is, we have a very, very serious crisis in this country, and we have got to make sure that when people need the help, they get the help. And the other question that we have to ask is – and it's a tough question, nobody I know knows the answer – why is it? Why is it? One of the reasons, by the way, is I think that doctors are prescribing opiates in a way that they have got to cut back a little bit on. They're giving out a whole lot of pills. A friend of mine got a mole removed. He got 50 very strong painkilling drugs. And these drugs are rampant, kids are using them, getting addicted and then getting into heroin. So I think we've got to talk to the pharmaceutical industry about what they're producing, doctors what they're prescribing, and we have to make treatment available to people when they need it.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Raul Bernal. He's a Democrat. He says he's undecided.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BERNIE SANDERS: First name is?

RAUL BERNAL (AUDIENCE MEMBER): Raul.

BERNIE SANDERS: Raul.

RAUL BERNAL (AUDIENCE MEMBER): Great. Senator Sanders, thank you very much for a great campaign you've run. Voters in Iowa, voters in New Hampshire, had had an opportunity to get to know you, to understand the details of your platform in forums just like this. And while I'm inspired by your passion on the issues, one of the concerns I have is your electability in a general election where there's less opportunity for you really to connect with voters.

BERNIE SANDERS: Good.

RAUL BERNAL (AUDIENCE MEMBER): And, you know, can you win in other parts of the country?

BERNIE SANDERS: Good. Excellent question. Look, in the real world, there are people, I hesitate to say this in this room, but there are people who like Donald Trump. I know. There are. Not in this room, but there are. And, you know, that's the world. We are a diverse political nation. And there are people who like and respect Hillary Clinton and people who like me and so forth and so on. And I don't object – somebody will stand up and say, "I support Hillary Clinton." That's fine, you know. But what I don't – I object to – is people say, "Well Bernie, I really like you. I like your ideas. I like your record. But I'm not going to vote for you because you can't win. Okay? So let me address that issue. Number one, I'm not a great fan of polls. Not even CNN polls. But CNN had a poll, as I recall, and what that poll said is that Bernie Sanders ran significantly better against Donald Trump than did Hillary Clinton. Okay? There was another poll that said the same thing. Because among other things, I do very well with Independents. And that's one of the reasons why we are doing well against Republicans. So number one, some of these polls have me way, way ahead of Donald Trump, further so than Secretary Clinton. Number two, look at battleground states like New Hampshire. The last poll I saw in New Hampshire had me 19 points ahead of Donald Trump – Secretary Clinton, one point. Okay? Similar results, not quite so strong in Iowa and Wisconsin. Okay. Polls – forget the polls, they go up and down. What else? Democrats win elections when there is a large voter turnout. That's what Obama did in 2008. Republicans win elections when people are demoralized and give up on the political process. I believe, and I think an objective assessment of my campaign and Secretary Clinton's campaign – she's running a good campaign – but I think an objective assessment would say that there is more excitement in energy in our campaign. We are bringing out working class people who have previously given up on politics. We are bringing out large numbers of young people. So if you want to win in November – and I want us to defeat Republicans, Secretary Clinton's want us to defeat Republicans – everybody in this room understands that we don't want some right-wing Republican in the oval office. But I believe, quite honestly, that I am the strongest candidate to do that because I think I can drive a large voter turnout, bring in new energy into the democratic party.

ANDERSON COOPER: Let me ask you, because as you know, in this state, an independent, and there are a lot of independents in this state, they can vote in the Republican primary, they can vote in the Democratic primary. There are some voters out there, independent voters, who are trying to decide between you or Donald Trump. What would you say to them?
BERNIE SANDERS: This is what I would say. I would say that examine Trump's record carefully. And it is not only his bigoted remarks against Latinos, suggesting that Mexicans that are coming into this country are rapists or criminals or drug dealers. Or his absurd remark that we should not allow Muslims into this country. Even above and beyond those outrageous bigoted statements, take a look at what he stands for economically. This country has millions of people struggling economically. I believe we should raise the minimum wage to fifteen bucks an hour over the next couple of years. Trump says, no $7.25 an hour, we should not raise the minimum wage. Most workers don't agree with that. Trump in a Republican debate said wages are too high in America! Really? Too high in America? That was what was said in a Republican debate. And here's another one that kind of blows me away. Trump is, as you know, a well-known scientist. Brilliant scientist. And he has concluded after years of studying the issue that climate change is a hoax brought to us by the Chinese. Now that shocked me Anderson because I thought that he would've thought it was a hoax brought to us by the Mexicans or the Muslims. Chinese I didn't quite get. But if you examine his agenda it is not an agenda for working Americans. He wants to give hundreds of billions of tax breaks to the top two tenths of one percent. So I think, and I would love the opportunity. Frankly, I'm prejudiced, but I want Trump to win the Republican nomination. And I would love the opportunity to run against him. I think we would win by a lot.

ANDERSON COOPER: We just have a few more, actually, if you'll take a seat. So we just have time for a few more questions. We've covered a lot of important policy issues. There's a lot of folks out there who really don't know much about you, so i thought we would ask a couple of sort of lighter questions, just to kind of get to know you. i read one of your daughters say, that if you had a car or if they sold cars with manual locks and windows, that's the kind of car you would get. So what kind of car do you actually have?

BERNIE SANDERS: I have a small Chevrolet. It is one of the smallest Chevys that they make ANDERSON COOPER: Do you know what year its from?

BERNIE SANDERS: Yeah, it's about 5 years old.

ANDERSON COOPER: Okay, not bad.

BERNIE SANDERS: A red car. It's pretty good on mileage, but yeah

ANDERSON COOPER: Is it true you chop your own wood?

BERNIE SANDERS: I wouldn't go that far. People in Vermont and New Hampshire would laugh at me. What I do do is, you know, we have a wood stove and I [sound effect]

ANDERSON COOPER: You also, in 1987, when you were mayor of Burlington. You recorded an album of folk classics. How are those pipes doing? We're in an opera house. Any [inaudible] in your future?

BERNIE SANDERS: Let me say this. If you're looking at a President who can carry a tune, I'm not the guy. I hope I have other attributes, but singing is not one of them. It's the worst album, actually its selling very well because people are buying it. It's the worst album ever recorded. People can't believe how bad it is.

MONICA TRANSCRIBE

ANDERSON COOPER: Along the same lines, Larry David is hosting SNL this weekend. He does a pretty good imitation of you. Do you do a Larry David imitation?

BERNIE SANDERS: Anderson, I'm gonna -- I know you've been in journalism for a long time –

ANDERSON COOPER: Are you doing Larry David right now? [cross talk]

BERNIE SANDERS: I am Larry David. And you didn't get it!

ANDERSON COOPER: What's your proudest moment? Either professionally or personally?

BERNIE SANDERS: I think my proudest general moment is being married for 27 years, having four great kids, some of them are here tonight, and seven very beautiful grandchildren. That's my proudest.

ANDERSON COOPER: If we ask -- your wife, Jane, is here. If we asked her to describe you in one word, what word do you think she'd use?

BERNIE SANDERS: Tell 'em, Jane.

ANDERSON COOPER: Anti?

BERNIE SANDERS: Integrity.

ANDERSON COOPER: I thought you said anti-greed, okay. Integrity.

ANDERSON COOPER: i want to give you 30 seconds to make a closing argument in new hampshire.

BERNIE SANDERS: thank you. i enjoyed it. this is called democracy and i loved it. our country faces enormous problems. if i believe that establishment politics and establishment economics could solve the problems, i would not be for president. the sad truth is that we have a rigged economic system, people are working longer hours for low wages, almost all new wealth and income is going to the top 1%. we have a corrupt campaign finance system, which is undermining democracy and allowing billionaires to buy elections. if elected president, i will do my best, working with the american people as we revitalize our democracy to take those issues on to rebuild the american middle class and become the country that all of us know that we have the potential to be. thank you all very much.

ANDERSON COOPER: senator sanders. thank you very much. when we come back, hillary clinton takes the stage, taking questions from the audience. we'll be right back.

ANDERSON COOPER: Welcome back to the CNN democratic presidential town hall at the Derry Opera House in New Hampshire. Thanks very much for being with us, you heard from democratic candidate Bernie Sanders. Please welcome former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Have a seat.
HILLARY CLINTON: Hello.
ANDERSON COOPER: Welcome.
HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you very much.
ANDERSON COOPER: You've obviously had a pretty incredible several past couple days. Congratulations on winning in Iowa, New Hampshire has always been good to the Clintons. How does it feel out there?
HILLARY CLINTON: It feels great. I've had just an amazing time. We landed in the middle of the night from Iowa, still pretty pumped up about winning there and then got to work the next day. And I'm seeing a lot of old friends, meeting a lot of new people. I have an uphill climb and I'm going to climb as high and hard as I can, because I want to make my case to the people of New Hampshire. As you said, they're people that I feel very close to. They've been good to my husband, to me, my family.
But what's most important is the first in the nation primary. It truly is a great opportunity to get out there, explain what you want to do as president, present your ideas, and get vetted by the people of New Hampshire.
ANDERSON COOPER: Bernie Sanders said just a short time ago said that he is the underdog here. Your campaign has said he comes from neighboring Vermont, you guys are down in the polls. Do you feel you do better when you're fighting from behind?
HILLARY CLINTON: You know, I don't know. I –
ANDERSON COOPER: Does it bring out something in you?
HILLARY CLINTON: Well, the intensity of the experience and the importance of trying to convey what's at stake in this election because to me obviously Tuesday's a really big deal with the primary, but the goal has to be to prevent the republicans from getting back into the white house and undoing all the progress that has been made under President Obama.
And so I -- I'm very proud of the campaign that senator sanders and I are running. I mean, we really have focused on issues. We share a lot of the same big progressive goals, but we have different ways of going about them, we bring different experiences. But we are contrasting on issues, compared to the republicans who I think are contrasting on insults. And I think it's a better contest where we can take our ideas to groups like this throughout New Hampshire, get questions, have people vet them and then let the voters make up their minds.

ANDERSON COOPER: You talk about progressive values, earlier in the day Sen. Sanders was asked if you were a progressive, he said 'some days.' Are you really a progressive? In the past you have said you said you plead guilty to being a moderate.

HRC: Well, you know, you asked me this question in the first debate, right?

COOPER: I did, and it's coming up again today.

HRC: And I said, I'm a progressive who likes to get things done and I was somewhat amused today that Sen. Sanders has set himself up to the gatekeeper on who is a progressive because under the definition that was flying around on twitter and statements by the campaign, Barack Obama would not be a progressive, Joe Biden would not be a progressive, Jeanne Shaheen would not be a progressive, even the late great Senator Paul Wellstone would not be a progressive. So I'm not going to let that bother me. I know where I stand, I know who stands with me, I know what I've done. But I don't think it helps for the Senator to be making those kinds of comparisons because clearly, we all share a lot of the same hopes and aspirations for our country that we want to see achieved. And I don't think it's appropriate if Planned Parenthood endorses me, or the Human Right Campaign endorses me, you know, they're thrown out of the progressive wing and put into the establishment. That's just not, that's just not anything we need to do. Let's have a good contest of ideas, let's contrast where we stand and that's what I intend to do for the next couple of days.

ANDERSON COOPER: It would obviously be historic if you were elected president, first of all.
HILLARY CLINTON: You think so? Yeah. [Applause]
ANDERSON COOPER: I've studied a little bit of history. Um, but it seems like young women aren't rallying to this potentially historic moment. And I say this in Iowa, among women under 30, Senator Sanders beat you by 70 points.

HILLARY CLINTON: That's amazing. Yeah, look, you know, I was very fortunate to have a great team of young people, men and women, supporting me. But I accept the fact that I have work to do to convey what I stand for, what I've accomplished, what I want to do for young people in our country.

ANDERSON COOPER: Why do you think it is?

HILLARY CLINTON: I don't really know, Anderson. I think…here's what I want young people to know. They don't have to be for me, I'm going to be for them. It doesn't really matter. If they are not supporting me, I will be their president, I will do everything I can to give them the opportunities they deserve. As I speak with young people across the country in Iowa, New Hampshire and elsewhere, I do sense this real feeling of being somehow disadvantaged, put on the wrong side of American opportunity, and I understand that. I mean, these student debt problems, the feeling that the jobs that are out there are not producing the kind of income or opportunity that young people believe they should be able to get. But at the same time, I'm so impressed by the intensity, the level of commitment from this generation, to really going after discrimination, going after racism, and sexism, and the kind of abuses the LGBTQ community members have – looking for ways to bring more justice in the economy, in the environment, fighting climate change. So I'm impressed with them, and I'm going to do everything I can to reach out and to explain why good ideas on paper are important, but you've got to able to translate them into action to get results for people. I have a lot of experience doing that, I think I can deliver positive change for young people in our country, and I hope I have the chance to win their support.

ANDERSON COOPER: What's wrong with a revolution?

HILLARY CLINTON: Well, that's for Senator Sanders to explain because that certainly is the core of his message to young people. I have a different take on it. I think the progress that we have made and particularly the Democratic Party has made, has been hard fought for, hard won, and must be defended. So I want to defend the Affordable Care Act. It is one of the great accomplishments, not only of this president but of the Democratic Party going back to Harry Truman. The Republicans are [applause] you know, the Republicans are determined to repeal it and they tried 62 times just to turn it back to the insurance companies. Senator Sanders and I share the same goal. We want to get to universal health care coverage. Before it was called Obamacare it was called Hillarycare, as you remember.

ANDERSON COOPER: I remember.

HILLARY CLINTON: I fought really hard, the insurance companies and the drug companies spent millions against me. I know what it's like to go up against the status quo and special interests. So when President Obama succeeded, I was thrilled. I don't agree with Senator Sanders that we should start over, that we should throw our country into a contentious national debate about health care again. We're at 90% coverage. I'm going to fix what needs to be fixed, we're going to move from 90 to 100, which is a lot easier to get to than starting at zero to get to 100. So we have a difference and I think that is important.

ANDERSON COOPER: i want you to meet some of the folks in our audience.

HILLARY CLINTON: sure, sure.

ANDERSON COOPER: this is dave scanell. he's a high school english teacher from manchester. he said he's undecided.

DAVE SCANELL: hi secretary clinton.

HILLARY CLINTON: hi.

DAVE SCANELL: you, the next president will have as many as three supreme court appointments to make. i'm wondering beyond abortion, are there any issues on which you would impose or assert a litmus test? and if your answer is no, aren't issues like marriage equality, campaign finance, just so vital to what we believe in as democrats that you would have to know the answer as to how these justices would rule before you make the nomination?

HILLARY CLINTON: i'll tell you what, dave, i do have a litmus test, dave. i have a bunch of litmus tests because i agree with you. the next president could get as many as three appointments. one of the many reasons we can't turn the white house over to the republicans again is because of the supreme court. i'm looking for people who understand how the real world works, who don't have a knee-jerk reaction to support business -- to support the idea that money is speech, that gutted the voting rights act. i voted for the reauthorization of the voting rights act when i was in the senate. it passed 98-0 based on a very extensive set of hearings and research. supreme court comes along, they substitute their judgment for the congress, signed by george w. bush. that is one of our problems. they have a view that i just fundamentally disagree with about what the way we have to keep the balance of power in our society is. so they have given way too much power to corporations, they have given citizens united the biggest gift to the koch brothers, karl rove, and all of those folks whose values i don't share and who are doing everything they can to try to turn the clock back. we have to preserve marriage equality. we have to go further to end discrimination against the lbgt community, we have got make sure to preserve roe v. wade, not let it be nibbled away or repealed. we've got work to do. and here's how i think about it. because when i was a senator, i had to vote on supreme court justices. i'm looking for people who are rooted in the real world, who know that part of the genius of our system, both economic and government, is this balance of power. if it gets too far out of whack so that business has too much power, any branch of the government has too much power, the delicate balance that makes up our political system and the broad based prosperity we should be working for in our economy is the worse off for it. so have i very strong feelings about what i am looking for if i am given the honor of appointing somebody to the supreme court.

ANDERSON COOPER: Want you to meet Jim Kinhan, a Democrat said he's supporting you.
AUDIENCE MEMBER: Madam Secretary, I'm pleased to see you. This may come a little bit from right field but it's very personal to me and resonates probably with many other people who are elderly dealing with health issues. The question is coming from me as a person who is walking with colon cancer. And I'm walking with colon cancer with the word terminal very much in my vocabulary, comfortably and spiritually. But I wonder what leadership you could offer within an executive role that might help advance the respectful conversation that is needed around this personal choice that people may make as we age and deal with health issues or be the care givers of those people to help enhance their end of life with dignity?
HILLARY CLINTON: First of all, thank you for being here, thank you so much for being part of this great New Hampshire primary process and thank you for your support. And I really appreciate your asking the question. I have to tell you this is the first time I've been asked that question.
AUDIENCE MEMBER: I figured that.
HILLARY CLINTON: Yes. I really --
AUDIENCE MEMBER: Maybe any candidate.
HILLARY CLINTON: And I thank you for it because we need to have a conversation in our country. There are states, as you know, that are moving to open up the opportunity without criminal liability for people to make this decision in consultation by their families, even in some cases with medical professionals, but the issue is whether the medical professionals want to be involved or just be counselors. So it is a crucial issue that people deserve to understand from their own ethical, religious faith-based perspective. So here's how I think about it. I want as president to try to catalyze that debate. Because I believe you're right. This is going to become an issue more and more often. We are on the good side having people live longer but often then with very serious illnesses that they can be sustained on but at some point don't want to continue with the challenges that poses. So I don't have any easy or glib answer for you. I think would I want to really immerse myself in the ethical writings, the health writing, the scientific writings, the religious writings. I know some other country, the Netherlands and others, have a quite open approach. I'd like to know what their experience has been because we have to be sure that nobody is coerced, nobody's under duress and that is a difficult line to draw. So I thank you, I thank you so much for raising this really important, absolutely critical question that we're all going to have to do some thinking about.
AUDIENCE MEMBER: Thank you.
HILLARY CLINTON: Hi, Michael.
MICHAEL FIELD: Hi, Secretary Clinton. As senator and as Secretary of State, you have a history of interventionist foreign policy that is troubling to many Democratic voters, including myself. As a voter who's opposed to the United States being the world's policemen, can you assure me that as president, you would not expand our military involvement abroad?
HILLARY CLINTON: No, I can't, Michael. I mean, I'd like to be able to say I could. But here's what I can say

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– I have learned and have been really in the crucible of making a lot of hard decisions over the last years, and military force must always be a last resort, not a first choice. That is one of the biggest differences between me and the Republicans. I worked very hard as Secretary of State to do what I could diplomatically to avoid conflict. That's why I worked to get the coalition together to impose sanctions on Iran so that we could get them to the negotiating table in order to test whether we could get an agreement to put a nuclear weapons agreement in place. I did that in large measure motivated by my deep concern that the absence of effective diplomacy might very well have sparked an arms race among some very unstable nations in the region and maybe even led to conflict. I will do everything I possibly can to avoid sending American troops abroad, getting us involved in military conflicts, but I can't in good conscience stand here and tell you that there would never be any circumstances in the time that I served as president where it very well might be in America's best vital national security interest. So I want to be honest with you. I will do what I can. I will stand against adventurism, ill-thought out missions. I will not send American combat troops to Iraq or Syria – that is off the table. That would be a terrible mistake. We will continue to use special forces, and we have to, because of the kinds of threats we face: you know, the network of terrorist organizations – not just ISIS, but others who are part of this unfortunate network that stretches from North Africa to South Asia – pose serious threats to friends, allies, and partners, as well as to ourselves. And we've got to keep our country safe, and we have to work with the rest of the world to try to defeat ISIS, to end that terrorist threat. So I will be a very careful, deliberate decision-maker when facing hard choices, because I know what's at stake. And I know you can understand why there can't be, from me anyway, a blanket statement, but I want to assure you I will be transparent, I will be open, and I will explain to the American people if any occasion arises where we do have to take military action to protect ourselves or our close friends and partners.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want to follow up, yesterday on Capitol Hill, the Senate Armed Services Committee – the Commandant of the Marine Corps said that he thinks, and I quote, "all eligible and qualified men and women should register for the draft," talking about selective service. Do you think women should also have to register for selective service like men?

HILLARY CLINTON: You know, first time I heard that yesterday, and here's the reasoning as best I understand from listening to the testimony excerpts: that if we are going to open combat positions to qualified women so that they can compete to be Army Rangers, they can compete to be Navy SEALs, they can compete to be Infantry Officers in the Marines, then we have expanded the definition of the all-volunteer military. I have to think about whether I think it's necessary to go as far as our military officers are recommending. You know, from my perspective the all-volunteer military has worked and we should not do anything that undermines it because it had provided a solid corps of people who are willing to serve our country. The idea of having everybody register concerns me a little bit unless we have a better idea of where that's going to come out. Where I want people to register – I want every young person to register at the age of 18 to be able to vote automatically. [Applause] You know, if we had a system like that I would be very, very pleased about it. I have a hard time imagining the kind of national emergency that would require the use of the selective service system. So I just have to be better informed about why they are making this recommendation.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Rebecca Hutchinson, she's a former state Representative in New Hampshire. She says she's undecided and she's got a question for you.

HILLARY CLINTON: Hi, Rebecca.

REBECCA HUTCHINSON (AUDIENCE MEMBER): Hi. Thank you. I feel in a way I sort of have a follow-up to the previous question. You clearly have very impressive foreign policy experience and I've heard you point out to us that President Obama chose you and trusted you to be his Secretary of State. But I get stuck when I think about you voted for the Iraq War, which you now say was a mistake. What have you learned since that vote that could give me confidence that you wouldn't make a mistake of that magnitude again?

HILLARY CLINTON: I think that's a very fair question. I did make a mistake and I admitted that I made a mistake and in large measure that mistake really rose from the Bush administration's approach to what they thought they could accomplish in Iraq. The very explicit appeal that President Bush made before announcing the invasion, that getting that vote would be getting a strong piece of leverage in order to finish the inspections. And he made that comment. And the UN inspector Hans Glick said give us the time, we will find out. Give us the hammer over their head, namely the vote, and we will be able to find out what they still have in terms of WMD. And the Bush administration didn't give him the time. And that was a breach of faith in my view. But you know, I gave him the vote in large measure because I thought that would give us the time and we would find out, short of an invasion. Turned out not to be and I really regret that's the way President Bush proceeded. That would not be something you would have to worry about with me. If I tell you we're gonna do diplomacy and hang tough and get answers, that's exactly what we will do.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet Sean Bourque, he's a Democrat from Derry. He says he is a supporter of yours. Sean?
HILLARY CLINTON: Hi, Sean.
AUDIENCE MEMBER: Hey. Once you become the nominee, and are elected, how are you going to protect yourself from right wing attacks?
HILLARY CLINTON: Well Sean, I've had a lot of practice. [Laughter.] You know, I could laugh up here but it's not easy. It is a brutal experience and when it first started happening to me back in the early nineties when I was working on health care, and, you know, I was just unrecognizable to myself. What talk radio was saying, what Republican members of Congress and their allies were saying, I was just stunned. I could not understand how they got away with it. And I have had to learn to take criticism seriously but not personally. And by that I mean this. The very fair question from Rebecca. People ask you questions and criticize you, think about it seriously. There are lessons to be learned often from people who don't agree with you. But don't take it personally so it just paralyzes you, or it literally stops you in your tracks. And now that I've been talking about it for so many years, my understanding of the political tactics of the other side uses is pretty well versed. They play to keep. They play to destroy. They are constantly doing whatever they can to win. And they have a history now going back 30, 36 years of going after people they can't otherwise stop unless they engage in negative attacks. So right now for example a couple of hedge fund billionaires have started a super PAC to run ads against me. Karl Rove has solicited money from Wall Street to run ads against me. I view that as perversely flattering because clearly they know I mean what I say and I will do what I say and I will stand in their way and I will stop them from perpetuating an agenda on America that is bad for democracy, bad for our economy, bad for our society. So I know I have to keep defending against them but I'm the one who has the experience to do that. It's unlike anything you've ever gone though to be the subject of tens of millions of dollars of untrue terrible attacks. Now the Koch brothers say they're gonna spend $750 million to defeat the Democratic nominee. I'm still standing, and I will be standing, so don't worry about that.

ANDERSON COOPER: Let me just quickly follow up. You mentioned a tax on the early 90s. Do you still believe there's a vast right-wing conspiracy?
HILLARY CLINTON: Don't you?
ANDERSON COOPER: I'm asking you.
HILLARY CLINTON: Yeah. It's gotten even better funded. You know, they brought in some new multi-billionaires to pump the money in. look, these guys play for keeps. They want to control our country. Senator Sanders and i agree on that completely. They want to rig the economy so they continue to get richer and richer, they could care less about income inequality. they solve their consciences by giving big money to philanthropy and getting great pictures of them standing in front of whatever charity they donated to but make no mistake, they want to destroy unions, they want to go after any economic interests that they don't believe they can control. They want to destroy our balance of power. They want to go after our political system and fill it with people who will do their bidding. i said today in Dover, you know, i don't think all of the republican candidates are so ill informed about climate change that they say they don't know because they're not scientists. They're just doing the bidding of the Koch brothers. They're told don't you dare say climate change is real because we're in the fossil fuel business. So this is exactly what they are up to. and, yes, it is probably -- look, at this point it's probably not correct to say it's a conspiracy because it's out in the open. there is no doubt about what they're doing and who the players are and what they're trying to achieve and they're shopping among the republicans candidates to figure out who among them will most likely do their bidding. So just know what we're up against because it's real and we're going to beat it, but it's going to take everybody working together. [applause]

ANDERSON COOPER: Meet Allison. She's an independent torn between you and Senator Sanders.
HILLARY CLINTON: Hi Allison.
ALLISON PYOTT (VOTER): I'm sensing a theme here. First, thank you so much for all you've done for our country and for women.
HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you.
ALLISON PYOTT (VOTER): My question's a number of factors, some you've just described, have eroded trust in you. What will you do to regain that trust, engender trust in Americans and me?
HILLARY CLINTON: Well, thank you for starting by saying it's related to what I just said. And I acknowledge this as personally painful as it is. When you have been subjected to the level, the velocity of attacks that come every day, even if there is no factual basis to it, it's just normal for people to say, gosh, there's got to be something, why do they keep saying this and then we do that. You know, I testify for 11 hours, there's nothing to Benghazi, they don't give it up, they keep coming after it. So I know that I have to really demonstrate as clearly as I can who I am, what I stand for and what I've always done. I've always been guided by the same values, I have always listened to people and I've always worked as hard as I could to produce results for people. So when I ran for the Senate the first time and I was out there and, you know, people were barraging, I was running first against Rudy Giuliani and all of that, I was able to just keep going and tell people here's who I am, here's what I do, I want to do this with you and I won and then since years later when I ran, I got a higher percentage. And then I did have, as you all remember, a really tough campaign against then-Senator Obama. We saw each other very up close and personal. And he wins and turns and asks me to be his Secretary of State because he trusts me, he trusts my judgment, he trusts my experience. So all I can do is to just get up every day and work to do what I believe our country needs, find ways to help people, whether it's on mental health or addiction or autism or student loans, whatever it might be and I trust the American people. I trust the people of New Hampshire to see my lifetime of work and service and to sort out all of the static and to know that I will work my heart out for you. and that's what I hope you will understand.

ANDERSON COOPER: i want to welcome rabbi sevette, he's an independent, said he's unsure of his vote.
RABBI JONATHAN SPIRA-SAVETT: another rabbi taught that every person has to have two pockets and in each pocket they carry a different note. in one pocket it says the universe was created for me and in the other pocket the note says i am just dust and, a. ashes. i want you to take a moment and tell us what you would tell bus your two pockets. how do you cultivate the ego that we all know you must have, a person must have to be the leader of the free world and also the humility to recognize that you can't be expected to be wise about all the things that the president has to be responsible for.
ANDERSON COOPER: another absolutely wonderful question. thank you, rabbi. i think about this a lot. i feel very fortunate that i am a person of faith, that i was raised in my church and that i have had to deal and struggle with a lot of these issues about ambition and humility, about service and self-gratification, all of the human questions that all of us deal with but when you put yourself out into the public, i think it's incumbent upon you to be as self-conscious as possible. this is hard for me. you know, i never thought i'd be standing on a stage here asking for people to vote for me of president. i always wanted to be of service. i met my husband who was such a natural, knew exactly what he wanted to do. i was happy to support him while i worked in the children's defense fund and legal services and taught law and had our daughter. i never thought i would do this. so i have had to come to grips with how much more difficult it often is for me to talk about myself than to talk about what i want to do for other people or to tell stories about, you know, the man i met in rochester whose aids medicine is no longer affordable. that can grip me and make me feel like there's something i can do about that. so i'm constantly trying to balance how do i assume the mantle of a position as essentially august as president of the united states and not lose track of who i am and what i believe in and do what i want to do to serve. i have that dialogue at least once a day in some setting or another. and i don't know that there is any ever absolute answer. like, okay, universe, here i am, watch me roar or, oh, my gosh, i can't do it, it's just overwhelming, i have to retreat. it's that balance that i keep to try to find in my life that i want to see back in our country and it will be something that i continue to talk about with a group of faith advisers who are close to me. i great scripture lesson every morning from a minister that i have a really close personal relationship with. and, you know, it just g me grounded. he gets up really early, sends it to me so there it is in my inbox at 5 a.m. i have friends who are rabbis who send me notes, give me readings that are going to be discussed in services. so i really appreciate all that incoming. and the final thing i would say because, again, it's not anything i've ever talked about this much publicly, everybody knows i have lived a very public life for the last 25 or so years. and so i've had to be in public dealing with some very difficult issues and personal issues, political, public issues. and i read a treatment of the prod call son by a jesuit poet and i read that parable and there was a line in it that became a lifeline for me and it basically is practice the discipline of gratitude. so regardless of how hard the days are, how difficult of the decisions are, be grateful, be grateful for being a human being, being part of the universe, be grateful for your limitations, know that you have to reach out to have more people with you to support you, to advise you, listen to your critics, answer the questions, but at the end be grateful, practice the discipline of gratitude and that has helped me enormously. [applause]

ANDERSON COOPER: we're going to have more questions from the audience for secretary clinton when we come back.

ANDERSON COOPER: Welcome back to the CNN democratic presidential town hall at the Derry Opera House in New Hampshire. We are here with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. I want to play a piece of video from Senator Sanders the other night in Iowa after the votes came in, and get you to respond.

SANDERS CLIP: We do not represent the interests of the billionaire class, Wall Street or corporate America. We don't want their money. And I am very proud to tell you that we are the only candidate on the democratic side without a super PAC.

And the reason that we have done so well here in Iowa, the reason I believe we're going to do so well in New Hampshire, and in the other states that follow. The reason is the American people are saying no to a rigged economy!

ANDERSON COOPER: We got a number of questions, even from people who support your policies, who say they do believe that you represent the interests of Wall Street and corporate America. How do you respond?

HILLARY CLINTON: Well, look, that's just not the case. And I did represent New York, obviously. There was no doubt that I took on a lot of what was going on down on wall street, including calling them out on the mortgage issues, calling for a consumer financial protection bureau, even before we got one created, calling for changes in CEO pay.

But I honestly think that the best answer to this is the fact that everybody that I know who looks at what's happening in this campaign sees the same thing. The Wall Street interests, the money interests, the republican political interests are spending a lot of money to try to defeat me. So I just find it kind of a strange argument.

I happen to agree with senator sanders. I'm not just going after Wall Street, though. I think that's too narrow a target. I think we need to go after a company like Johnson Controls that is trying to avoid paying taxes after all of us bailed it out by pretending to sell itself in a so-called inversion in Europe. It’s a perversion. It should be stopped.

I want to go after the hedge funds that have bought up drug companies. You know Valeant Pharmaceuticals, Turing Pharmaceutical, taking drugs that have been around a long time and upping the price. I take seriously the obligation that I would have as president, once again to try to get the deck unstacked, to get the odds favoring the average American again.

But I just have to -- I have to respectfully say I think senator sanders' target is too small. I really do. I respect him going after the big banks. I agree with him no, bank is too big to fail, no executive too powerful to jail. But we actually passed the process to be able to take on banks that pose excessive risk in our financial system in Dodd-Frank. So let's know the next president has to implement, but doesn't have to achieve that.

Here's what I want to do. I want to go after all the other culprits. It wasn't just the big banks. It was the insurance company, AIG. It was the investment bank Lehman Brothers, it was countrywide mortgage, it was Wachovia. There were a lot of bad actors. If you all you do is look over here, I’m telling you, they're going to be over there in the shadow banking sector just cooking up all kinds of ways to once again put our economy at risk.

I’ve got no argument that we need to take on this vested interest. I just have a wider group that i think we need to go after, from pharmaceuticals, insurance companies, shadow banking and other corporations that I think are undermining our economy and frankly they are undermining our democracy.

This Johnson Control thing really infuriates me. We bailed them out. The Republicans wanted the auto industry to just fail. They didn't care about the millions of jobs. Barack Obama and the democratic congress gave them a bailout. It turned out to be a good deal. All of us paid for it. They paid back the treasury, so we didn't lose any money and we saved millions of jobs – and the auto industry just had a great year. Johnson Controls was one of those begging for the bailout and now they're not going to pay their taxes? We're going to go right after that. That is absolutely wrong and we need to be focused on getting a fix to that.

ANDERSON COOPER: One of the things Sen. Sanders points to and a lot of your critics point to is you gave 3 speeches to Goldman Sachs, you were paid $675,000 for 3 speeches, was that a mistake? Was that a bad error in judgment?

HRC: Look I made speeches to lots of groups. I told them what I thought. I answered questions.

COOPER: But did you have to be paid $675,000?

HRC: Well, I don't know. That's what they offered. You know, every Secretary of State that I know has done that.

COOPER: But they were retired from office and not running for another office.

HRC: Well I wasn't running. I wasn't committed to running. I didn't know whether I would or not

COOPER: You weren't planning on running for President again?

HRC: You know I didn't. When I was Secretary of State I said several times, you know I think I'm done. You know, so many people came to me, started talking to me, the concerns I had about the Republicans taking back the White House because I think they wrecked what we achieved in the 90s with 23 million new jobs and incomes going up for everybody. I did not want to see that happen again. I want to defend President Obama's accomplishments and the progress we've made so we can go further. So yeah I was convinced. But anybody, anybody who knows me that thinks they can influence me, name anything they've influenced me on. Just name one thing. I'm out here everyday saying I'm going to shut them down, going after them, jailing them if they should be jailed, to break em up. They're not giving me much money now, I can tell you that much. Fine with me, I'm proud to have 90% of my donations from small donors. And 60%, the highest ever from women which is something I'm really really proud of.

COOPER: So just to be clear, that's not something you regret those 3 speeches?

HRC: No I don't. Because I don't feel that I pay any price for it and I'm very clear about what I will do and you're on notice.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want to see if chris lopez is here. Chris, there you are. Chris is an independent with a question for secretary clinton. She says she undecided, I should point out.

HILLARY CLINTON: hi, chris.

CHRIS LOPEZ: hi. thanks for taking my question. i see a lot of hypocrisy in this country when I have a really hard time getting the medicine I need and yet it's really easy to get alcohol. What will you do to decriminalize marijuana so people -- so I and people like me can get the pain and spasm relief that we need?

HILLARY CLINTON: I will do a lot, Chris, because we have an opportunity to do much more with respect to research into marijuana, what it can do to help people with the kinds of conditions you've just briefly described. I want to move it from a schedule one drug to a schedule two so we can begin do more research – the NIH and a lot of universities so can begin to try to find out because i want you to know what we know from science. but i also want you to be able to use it while we're doing the research. And so many states as, as you know, have moved to provide legal protection for the use of medical marijuana. I support that, I think the states are the laboratories of our democracy. i think we should be learning about what works, what doesn't work. different states have actually listed the kind of illnesses and conditions it can be used for. are they right, we don't know. that's why we to do the research. i also want you to know what dosage is right, what interacts with the other medication you're taking. I want to accelerate this because I have no doubt that there are very real benefits for people. We know in chemotherapy, and we know from other conditions in using the right amount of the right kind of marijuana. I just want to make sure it's the right amount and the right kind. that's why i want to get that research up and going as quickly as possible. But you said something else which i think is really important. We can't be here in New Hampshire and not talk about the addiction problem in New Hampshire. not talk about the fact that there have been more deaths by overdoses than car crashes in this state. Not talk about the lives that are being destroyed, the people that i meet, the grandmothers raising their grandchildren because they've lost their children. i just left a rally in Manchester and a woman grabbed my hand and she said i just lost my son to an overdose. So I have been working with elected officials like Senator Shaheen, like Governor Hassan, like Governor Shumlin of Vermont who supports me, to try to figure out how do we put together a new approach, a new law enforcement approach so first time, low-level drug users are not sent to jail, but instead we have more treatment and recovery programs. There are 23 million people who need help in our country – both alcohol and drugs – there are 10 percent of kind of spaces that they need to take care of those people. So we got to work on law enforcement, we got to work on doctors to understand better when they prescribe opioids, which is often the first step toward heroin. We have to have every police department equipped with naloxone, which is the antidote to reverse overdose and lives in New Hampshire. So all of this here fits together. You deserve answers about marijuana, and we deserve more treatment for people who are addicted to drugs and alcohol for other kinds of challenges. So that's what I want to do.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to meet - this is Julie Carignan, she's from from Windham. Julie?
HILLARY CLINTON: Hi.
JULIE CARIGNAN: Hi. Thank you for taking my question. I'm the proud mother of five girls, two of my own, three step daughters. And unfortunately they are all Feeling The Bern. And I would like to know what you would do to convince them to vote for you.
HILLARY CLINTON: How old are they?
JULIE CARIGNAN: They're in their - 21, 22, a couple 23's and a 25-year-old.
HILLARY CLINTON: Well, first of all, tell them I'm just – I'm glad they're interested in politics and I really mean that. I want them to be involved. I want them to feel like I felt when I was that age, some years ago, and getting excited and interested in politics for the first time. I also want them to take a look at my record, what I have done my entire life, starting as a young lawyer, working for the Children's Defense Fund, taking on the problem of juveniles incarcerated with adults in South Carolina; trying to gather information to end segregated academies in the South. I want them to know I was a legal services lawyer standing up for equality under the law, defending people's rights because I believe passionately that those of us who have the opportunity to serve should serve. And then I hope they will look at what I have accomplished from starting the Children's Health Insurance Program that insures 8 million kids, looking at ways to try to be smart in reforming our adoption and foster care system with very partisan Republicans when I was First Lady, getting health care for our National Guard, helping to negotiate and implement a treaty to reduce nuclear weapons, a long list. And the reason I say that is I think it's very important that as people move toward the primary on Tuesday, whatever your age, you really think about what someone is proposing and what their record is about getting it done. And as I've said and I mean it absolutely, I have the highest respect for Senator Sanders. But as the Concord Monitor said today in its writing about this, you know, it's very hard to see how any of his proposals could ever be achievable. So I don't want to overpromise. We've had too much of that. I want to tell people what I will do, I want to be specific because I do want - to go back to the question I was asked earlier - recreate the trust that seems to have been splintered in America. We need to set big goals again. I am all for that, I have big ambitious goals, affordable college, early childhood education, making sure that we're on the path to paid family leave, all of which will help your daughters. But I also want them to hold me accountable. I want them to say, okay, how is that actually going to happen? What do we have to do to make it? We've got to get 60 votes to break a filibuster in the Senate. Nancy Pelosi has said we're not going to revisit health care. We're going to stick with the Affordable Care Act. That's exactly where I am. We're going to improve it. Because I am somebody who wants to actually produce a real difference in people's lives. I am a progressive who gets results and I will be a progressive president who gets results. And the final thing I would say is, it is still the case that there are challenges and obstacles to young women's ambitions. And I'm going to try to break the highest and hardest glass ceiling. I hope it splinters completely. And I hope for your daughters it opens doors that might not be open right now. Regardless of whether any of them ever do anything politically, but in their lives, their professions, how they're treated, I hope it does give them more of a sense of empowerment. That's what I want for my daughter and my amazing granddaughter and that's what I want for your daughters.

ANDERSON COOPER: just as we did with senator sanders, we've talked about a lot of important policy issues. i want to ask a couple of personal questions for voters to get --

HILLARY CLINTON: you don't think they know everything?

ANDERSON COOPER: i don't know, we'll see about that. it's interesting to me. as you said, you have been one of the most famous women in the world now for decades. you have no anonymity. if you could be anonymous for just one day, what would do you?

HILLARY CLINTON: i used to do this in the white house. and, you know, i would put on a baseball cap and sunglasses and, you know, sweatpants and a sweatshirt and pull my hair back and i would go walk and i would tell the secret service they had to wear casual clothes, htey had to take the thing out of their ears, they had to look like they were just tourists. i had the best time. i would end up over on the mall sometimes walking around and a family would come up and say "would you mind taking our picture in front of the white house?" and i'd say, "i'd be happy to". so there's nothing i like better than to be anonymous, as hard as that is to achieve. so i would spend the day out in nature, taking a long walk, walking through one of the beautiful towns here in new hampshire, stopping in a cafe, stopping in a bookstore, you know, maybe calling some of my friends, some of whom are here tonight, and say "don't tell anybody but meet me there." that's what i want to do. and it's what i get the great joy out of. i am so fortunate that i still have my friends from grade school and every other phase of my life. they keep me grounded, they keep my honest, they deflate my head, they deal with the universe in one pocket and the dust and ashes in the other. so any time i get to spend time with them and then of course it would have to end with seeing my granddaughter because that's the creme de resistance.

ANDERSON COOPER: what does she call you?

HILLARY CLINTON: she calls me grandma, grandma. she's working really hard on words and it was so thrilling, they came to iowa that last weekend because we obviously weren't going to leave and so they got in late in the night saturday night and sunday morning i'm getting ready and bill and i are having coffee and everything. so chelsea brings her in and she sees me and she goes grandma! and honest to goodness, the caucus could have ended right there. i would have been perfectly happy saying, the best thing has happened to me right this minute in iowa. so that's where i'd end my day.

ANDERSON COOPER : You talk about the circle of friends you have. Obviously, in 2011 your mom passed away. In 2008 she was part of your campaign. And you wrote about how at the end of the day you would sit around the table, kick off your shoes and talk about everything that had happened. What advice do you think she would give you today in this campaign this year?
HILLARY CLINTON: My mother truly is my inspiration because see had such a terrible, miserable life and was abandoned and rejected by her own family and was out at the age of 14 working as a house maid. And her resilience, her love, her ability to have her own family, to take such care of us to me was, you know, to me the ultimate of accomplishment in any life. And she would always give me the advice she gave me as a little girl. You know, you get knocked down, everybody gets knocked down. What matters is whether you get up and when you get up what do you do? How do you behave? Are you going to be bitter, angry, upset? Are you going to try to be positive, get something done, help somebody else? And I'm sure that's exactly what she would be saying now. She would be encouraging me, she'd be very proud, a little apprehensive because, you know, it's a brutal business being in politics and people say things about those you love, whether it's your daughter or someone else. So she was -- she was very supportive but you could tell, you know, how much pain she kind of absorbed from time to time. So I would sit with her and I would say, "Don't listen to that stuff, mom." And she'd say, "Well, I have to know what they're saying about you."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'd say, you know, “Don't put yourself through that.” So that would be what she'd be doing now I think, too.

ANDERSON COOPER: I want you to be able to make a closing argument to the people in New Hampshire.
HILLARY CLINTON: Oh. Well thank you. Well first of all, thanks again for being part of this process, this first in the nation primary. You know, I said earlier today, some people said, well, you know, Senator Sanders is ahead – and I respect that – and so maybe, you know, I should go on to the next states. And I said, absolutely not. New Hampshire has been so good to me and my family, and I love campaigning in New Hampshire. I love this process. So you're going to have to put up with me. I'm going to be going around the state, going to as many events as I can, answering as many questions, trying to talk about what I am offering. I really believe that we have a chance to build on the progress we've made and to get results for people, to get the economy producing more good jobs, to get incomes rising again. That's my goal. I will not raise middle class taxes, because the middle class hasn't even yet recovered from the Great Recession. We're going to stick with the Affordable Care Act, we're going to make it work, we’re going to get early childhood education, affordable college, and pay down student debt – a lot of the agenda that is important to our country, particularly to young people. And we're going to defend our rights. We're going to defend a woman's right to make her own health care decisions, we're going to defend Planned Parenthood, we're going to defend marriage equality and end discrimination against LGBT Americans. And we’re going to take on the gun lobby, because it is absolutely unconscionable to have 33,000 people a year die from gun violence. So please, join me in this campaign. I hope you will come out and vote for me on Tuesday, and I will fight for you every single day in the White House. Thank you all very much.

Israel Declares Gaza Truce Over, 50 Die in Gaza Shelling

Israel declared a Gaza ceasefire over on Friday and killed more than 50 Palestinians in renewed shelling, saying militants had breached the truce shortly after it began and apparently captured an Israeli soldier. The 72-hour break announced by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon was the most ambitious attempt so far to end more than three weeks of fighting, and followed mounting international alarm over a rising Palestinian civilian death toll. The ceasefire was to be followed by Israeli-Palestinian negotiations in Cairo on a longer-term solution.

IDF Soldier Feared Kidnapped, 2 Other Soldiers Killed

A Hamas attack on IDF soldiers in southern Gaza, which occurred an hour and a half after the start of a humanitarian truce, ended with the suspected kidnapping of a soldier, the IDF said Friday. Second Lt. Hadar Goldin, a 23-year-old Givati officer from Kfar Saba, was named as the IDF soldier presumed to be abducted by Hamas. His family has been notified. Two other soldiers were killed during the incident. Their families have been notified. Terrorists emerged from a tunnel shaft, and a suicide bomber detonated himself in the vicinity of soldiers. Heavy exchanges of fire ensued, before one of the IDF soldiers was kidnapped, a senior army source said.

US Envoy Seeks Extension of Gaza Truce

The No. 2 US diplomat will head to Cairo and seek to extend beyond 72 hours a truce agreed upon by Israel and Hamas, a senior US official said Friday. Deputy Secretary of State William Burns — a veteran career diplomat frequently tasked with delicate missions — will travel to Egypt this weekend to take part in talks as part of the three-day truce that took effect Friday, the official said. The official said Burns would look to see if the two sides can extend the truce in the deadly conflict, especially as negotiators need time to travel to Cairo. Israeli officials rarely meet during the Jewish Sabbath that starts at sundown on Friday.

Netanyahu Reprimands Cabinet Ministers for Politicking During War

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu lashed out at his ministers for playing politics during Operation Protective Edge at Thursday's cabinet meeting. "I call upon you not to harm the special unity that there is among us right now," Netanyahu said. "Watch your words, be careful with your actions. Above all, cabinet ministers must present a personal example to the entire public. At this time, the nation expects all of us, especially cabinet ministers, to unite behind a common goal." The prime minister referred to a book by his brother, the late Entebbe commander Yonatan Netanyahu, who wrote that the wars of the Jews started after the fighting, not before it was over.

Abbas Seeks Broad Support for War Crimes Charges

Nearly a month into Israel's fierce assault on Hamas in Gaza, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is facing mounting domestic pressure to seek war crimes charges against Israel at the International Criminal Court. He has hesitated in the past because such a move would instantly put the Palestinians on a risky collision course with Israel. But with about 1,400 Palestinians killed in Gaza, according to health officials, Abbas has signaled he might move ahead — cautiously. Palestinian officials said Thursday that Abbas asked all Palestinian political factions, including Hamas and the smaller group Islamic Jihad, to give their written consent to such a move. Different PLO factions signed up in a meeting in the West Bank earlier this week, while Abbas is still waiting for a response from Hamas and Islamic Jihad, they said.

Under Fire and Out of Cash, U.N. Overwhelmed by Gaza Crisis

The United Nations in Gaza is struggling to withstand a flood of almost a quarter of a million refugees into shelters that have repeatedly come under Israeli fire. Out of cash, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), the main U.N. body in the impoverished enclave of 1.8 million Palestinians, says it can barely handle the humanitarian crisis unleashed by more than three weeks of fighting between militants and Israel. Asked to explain the scale of the civilian suffering to an Arab news station, an UNRWA spokesman simply burst into tears.

Israel Has to Keep Hamas from Rebuilding once Gaza Fighting Ends

Determined to avoid a repeat of the fighting in the Gaza Strip, Israel is seeking to build support for having an international force take charge of preventing the Palestinian militant group Hamas from rearming once the conflict is over. One sticking point remains: finding countries willing to take on the job. The idea, floated repeatedly by top Israeli officials in recent days, comes at what could be a key point in the 3-week-old conflict. With the announcement of a 72-hour cease-fire starting Friday morning, the Israelis apparently believe they are close to destroying the bulk of the tunnels that Hamas, which controls Gaza, has spent years digging and fortifying, and a significant portion of the group's arsenal of rockets.

Wall Street Journal

Islamist Surge Threatens Mideast Powers

The eruptions of Islamist violence in the Gaza Strip, Syria and Iraq have begun shaking the Middle East to its core, increasing the likelihood that a new order will emerge when the dust starts to settle. The region's traditional power centers—Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Israel—are all threatened by the surge of Islamist forces that aim to disrupt the status quo. Even Shiite Iran, which often stokes Islamist movements, is finding that the surge of Sunni extremism is threatening its position in the region. The hope among U.S. officials and U.S. allies is that, in the long run, those traditional powers—which are more often rivals than partners—will find common interest in curbing the extremist forces.

The Economist – July 31, 2014

Israel - Winning the Battle, Losing the War

Editorial

HAMAS has ruled Gaza since 2007 and there is not much to admire. The Islamist party is harsh, narrow-minded and intolerant of dissent. Its charter is anti-Semitic. It fires rockets into Israeli territory and builds tunnels under it to kill or kidnap Israeli soldiers. It knows that the Israeli attacks it provokes will kill hundreds of Palestinian civilians, which will garner sympathy around the world. It is also weaker than it was, for it is now losing the military battle against Israel.

By contrast Israel is the most successful state in the Middle East. It is the region's only true democracy—a hub of invention, enterprise and creativity. Israel has overwhelming firepower in the fight in Gaza. Most of its people are united behind their soldiers and have the firm backing of America's Congress. Yet, though Israel is winning the battle, it is struggling in the war for world opinion (see article). That matters in part because Israel is a cosmopolitan trading country that looks to its American ally for security, but also because Israel needs to hear some of what its critics are saying.

Anti-Semitism: a very light sleeper

A generation ago, Israel had the best of the argument with Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organisation, in many ways a less vile outfit than Hamas. Young Europeans spent their gap years on kibbutzim. The Western world cheered when Israeli commandos rescued Jewish hostages from the terminal building in Uganda's Entebbe airport in 1976.

But as the occupation of Palestinian territory has dragged on, sympathy has seeped away. In a poll published in June, before the destruction of Gaza, the citizens of 23 countries put the balance of those who think Israel is a good or bad influence on the world at minus 26%, ranking it below Russia and above only North Korea, Pakistan and Iran. A growing number of Europeans call Israel racist (with the sinister flourish that Israelis, of all people, should know better). And even in America, where a solid majority backs Israel, the share that thinks its actions against the Palestinians are unjustified has risen since 2002 by five percentage points, to 39%. Among 18- to 29-year-olds, Israel is backed by just a quarter.

Many Israelis, and their most fervent supporters in Congress, see today's hostility as the culmination of a long process of demonisation, double standards and delegitimisation. They have a point. Holding a country to high standards, as Israel's critics do, can be a compliment—yet against Israel, morality is often used as a cudgel. The common slur that Israel is an apartheid state ignores the fact that Israel's minorities, such as the Druze, Arabs and Bahais, are protected by the country's independent courts—including the highest, which has a sitting Arab Israeli judge. The "BDS" campaign to impose boycotts, encourage divestment and introduce sanctions calls not just for an end to the occupation of the West Bank and for equal rights, but also for the right of return of all Palestinian refugees—in other words, for the erosion of Israel as a Jewish homeland. Protests in France against the fighting in Gaza led to attacks on synagogues and Jewish-owned businesses.

No wonder that many Israelis feel that the world is against them, and believe that criticism of Israel is often a mask for antipathy towards Jews. But they would be wrong to ignore it entirely. That is partly because public opinion matters. For a trading nation built on the idea of liberty, delegitimisation is, in the words of an Israeli think-tank, "a strategic threat". But it is also because some of the foreign criticism is right.

Please, hear them

That begins with the scale of the violence in Gaza. Some 1,400 Palestinians have died in the past few weeks, compared with 56 Israeli soldiers and four civilians. Even allowing for Hamas's brutality, no democracy should be happy with a military strategy that results in the death of so many children (let alone the crass claim from Israel's ambassador to Washington that its soldiers deserve a Nobel peace prize). The destruction is driving support towards Hamas and away from the moderate Palestinians who are Israel's best chance for peace.

But more than that, Israel needs to hear what its critics say about the need for a two-state solution, which remains the only one that will work. Time is not on Israel's side. Palestinians may already outnumber Israelis in the lands they share. Without two states, Israelis and Palestinians will be left with one that contains them both. The risk for Israel is of either a permanent, non-democratic occupation that disenfranchises Palestinians, or a democracy in which Jews are in a minority. Neither would be the Jewish homeland with equal rights for all that Israel's founding fathers intended.

America's secretary of state, John Kerry, has made a Herculean effort to forge peace between the Israelis and the Palestinians along the lines of two states for two peoples. When the talks broke down, a few months ago, he blamed Israel's settler lobby. That outraged right-wing Israelis. And now the left has joined in the derision because he proposed a ceasefire in Gaza that Israelis thought favoured Hamas. But Mr Kerry is right. If Israel continues to build settlements in the occupied territory, it will gobble up land that would belong to an independent Palestinian state, making peace harder to reach.

The same goes for what appears to be Israel's strategy towards both Gaza and the West Bank. Having created a huge open-air prison in Gaza, Israel remains committed to a blockade that contains Hamas—but also ensures that ever more Palestinians grow up angry. On the West Bank, Israel's prime minister, Binyamin Netanyahu, has gone backwards: he has said that Israel cannot relinquish security control of the West Bank for fear of Islamist attack. That implies an intention to consolidate the occupation, thus withdrawing all hope from Palestinian moderates. The West Bank would be likely to explode too, then, while the demographic clock ticked on.

For all the blood and misery in Gaza, Mr Netanyahu will soon have a chance to show he has heard the critics. Having won his battle, he could return to the negotiating table, this time with a genuine offer of peace. Every true friend of Israel should press him to do so.

Israel's Doctrine of Proportionality in Gaza

By Dore Gold

The images of destruction after the battle between the Israel Defense Forces and Hamas that began July 20 in the Shajaiya neighborhood in the Gaza Strip have caused many to declare, in a now-frequent refrain, that the IDF is behaving "disproportionately." Some commentators are simply dressing up in sophisticated language their belief that Israel is using excessive force, but others clearly mean to accuse Israel of violating the laws of war — specifically, of violating the doctrine of proportionality. These accusations have no merit.

Shajaiya was not just another neighborhood in Gaza, but rather a crown jewel of Hamas' effort to intertwine civilians and terrorists to complicate Israel's ability to defend itself. Shajaiya was crisscrossed with an elaborate network of underground bunkers and tunnels containing equipment for the manufacture of rockets, storage facilities for rockets and other weapons, and launching sites from which the rockets were fired at Israeli towns. It was a civilian area where Hamas embedded its most important military capabilities, precisely to encourage condemnation of Israel should the IDF be forced to fight there.

Moreover, multiple attack tunnels whose exit points are in Israel had entrance points in Shajaiya. These tunnels allow Hamas to cross under the border fence and penetrate Israeli territory to carry out attacks on civilians. Mothers in Israeli villages near the Gaza border feared that terrorists would emerge from the tunnels, kidnap their children and drag them back as hostages to the Gaza Strip, a concern that became more terrifying when handcuffs and tranquilizers were found in the tunnel system.

Shajaiya encapsulates the challenge Israel faces in the Gaza conflict: How can Israel defend itself without being accused of violating the principle of proportionality?

Israel had three choices in how to deal with Shajaiya. First, it could have decided that it had every right to use overwhelming force to neutralize the neighborhood with air power, ignoring the question of collateral damage to civilians, much like the Allied bombing campaigns of World War II, or NATO's three-month campaign against Yugoslavia in 1999, in which 40,000 homes were destroyed. This option was not even a consideration for the IDF.

Second, looking at how Hamas had embedded its military capabilities within civilian neighborhoods, Israel could have decided there was nothing it could do, thus allowing Hamas to strike at Israeli population centers with impunity. Such a decision would have granted Hamas a license to kill Israelis, something no Israeli government — or, indeed, any accountable democracy — could do.

Finally, there was the decision that Israel ultimately made: Separate, as much as possible, the civilian population from the Hamas fighters and arms in their midst. This required getting the Palestinian population to evacuate potential target areas by multiple means: dropping leaflets with evacuation routes, breaking into Hamas radio broadcasts with warnings about specific areas, Arabic-language telephone calls to homes and text messages to cellphones. While the notification process was underway, an Israeli drone would hover over the area that was to be cleared to ensure that residents had left.

Against this Israeli effort, Hamas employed a counter-strategy of trying to prevent civilians from heeding Israeli warnings. On July 8, Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri appeared on local television and called on Gazans to serve as human shields against Israeli air attacks. Hamas enforcers sought to dissuade civilians from fleeing. And, anticipating a ground incursion into neighborhoods like Shajaiya, Hamas booby-trapped whole rows of homes, hoping to collapse them on Israeli soldiers. This only magnified the scale of the destruction.

It should be recalled that proportionality in international law has a very specific meaning: It is the calculation a military commander must make as to whether the military advantage to be gained by the use of force is greater than the probable harm that may be inflicted on the surrounding civilian population. Anyone who complains about "disproportionality" must explain exactly what the IDF should have done to neutralize the terrorist threat from Shajaiya while causing less destruction than what occurred.

War between an embattled democracy, like Israel, and a terrorist organization, like Hamas, inevitably produces certain asymmetries. Israel heavily invested in the defense of its population, including air raid shelters as well as a missile defense system, known as Iron Dome. Where did Hamas put the billions of dollars it obtained from supporters like Qatar? It built the system of attack tunnels and an arsenal of missiles. Yet there are those who wrongly infer Israeli intent to cause civilian casualties from the greater damage suffered by Hamas, which resulted from a war Hamas imposed, and from its readiness to sacrifice the lives of its people to advance its extremist goals.

Dore Gold served as Israel's permanent representative to the United Nations from 1997 to 1999. He is an advisor to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— While the GOP's rigidity when it comes to opposing any new tax increase is well known, a robust debate is playing out on the right about what exactly tax reform should look like.

Grover Norquist, the conservative crusader who runs Americans for Tax Reform, says he's happy that so many more presidential candidates have detailed plans for how they'd like to change the tax code compared to four years ago. "Republicans putting these plans down on paper is really healthy," he said. "They're all generally moving in the right direction."

The GOP field falls into two camps: those who want to simplify the existing code and those who want to blow it up and start from scratch. Who falls into which group closely mirrors the larger ideological cleavage in the field between the pragmatists and the ideologues.

The incrementalists: John Kasich and Jeb Bush each call for reducing the number of tax brackets from seven to three and setting the top marginal income tax rate at 28 percent. (The top rate now is 39.6 percent.) Marco Rubio, working with Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah), proposed three rates on individuals: 35 percent, 25 percent and 15 percent. Chris Christie also advocates going to three rates, with his top rate at 28 percent. Even Donald Trump backed three rates: 10 percent, 20 percent and 25 percent, with a 15 percent corporate tax rate.

The start-from-scratch crowd: Ted Cruz calls for starting over with an across the board flat tax rate of 10 percent. Rand Paul backs a slightly higher flat rate of 14.5 percent on individuals. Both the Texas and Kentucky senators propose controversial business taxes that have been compared to the value-added tax used in Europe. Ben Carson wants a tax model based on the tithing called for in the Bible, but he has not laid out specifics in a way that can be scored by economists. Rick Santorum endorses a 20 percent flat tax, with special breaks for manufacturers.

For 90 minutes yesterday at Norquist's office, economic policy advisers representing five of the GOP campaigns argued with each other each other about the dueling approaches.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush adviser Danny Heil nodded to the fact that voters see flat taxes as regressive and that across-the-board cuts tend to benefit the rich more than the poor. That, he explained, would make the Cruz and Paul plans a tougher sell in a general election. He said the Bush plan is the most comprehensive thing that is achievable within "the existing system" and that it could be "readily implemented."

Rubio's campaign policy director, Johnny Slemrod, said there are things to like about other plans but the Florida senator's focus is on offering something that actually has a chance of getting enacted. He said theirs is "the most realistic plan to get there."

Kasich adviser Kerry Knott called Trump's plan "a fantasy" that has no chance of ever going into effect, and he criticized Cruz and Paul for supporting ideas that sound good in theory but don't work in practice.

Cruz and Rand's representatives, meanwhile, made the case that the flat tax makes the most economic sense. Because of the venue and the nature of the debate, they did not engage about the huge deficits that several of these plans could lead to.

One flash point between the Floridians: Jeb thinks an internet sales tax is necessary for fairness while Rubio promises to veto it.

— Steve Forbes is out this week with a new book, "Reviving America," that makes an exhaustive case for a 17 percent flat tax for individuals and corporations. The two-time presidential candidate said several candidates are "just about there" with the plans they've rolled out so far. He criticizes the "traditionalists" who want piecemeal fixes instead of a total overhaul. "The best thing is to start all over again," Forbes said. "Don't negotiate with yourself! Put the purist thing out!" He says it is dangerous to keep multiple tax rates because, like rabbits, they multiply.

Forbes, who stumped for Rick Perry four years ago, told the 202 that he will "probably" endorse again this year. "I feel like I'm in the dating game," he said. "I'm an agitator. That's my role now."

— Thinking ahead: Even if there's a Republican president in 2017, Norquist predicts that Paul Ryan will still be in the driver's seat on tax reform and exert more influence over the outcome than anyone else. Overhauling the code is the new Speaker's pet issue, and he made clear when he agreed to give up his chairmanship of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee that he was not going to let go. Grover told the 202 that he hopes debating these approaches now will make it easier to pass something during the first few months of the next Republican administration.

— NO DEAL…YET: The House is still struggling to approve a government spending bill before Friday, when the government will shut down if there's no action. With time running out, leaders might move a short-term bill to extend funding for a bit while they continue negotiating. Sticking points include GOP riders to prevent Syrian and Iraqi refugees from entering the U.S.; attempts to block President Obama's environmental regulations; and a weakening of financial reforms in the Dodd-Frank Act.

MEET THE "HOPE YES, VOTE NO" CAUCUS: The spending bill is one of new Speaker Paul Ryan's first tests of how well he can control his right flank. As Mike DeBonis puts it, Ryan needs to persuade the 120 or so members of the "Hope yes, vote no" caucus, meaning those Republicans who "privately fear the repercussions of a federal shutdown or default but have been compelled to vote against compromise bills because of political pressure from the right." Along with the 40 or so House Freedom Caucus-members, this bloc of Republicans has bucked leadership on a series of key spending and debt limits votes since the GOP retook the House majority in 2011. Bringing them in line is a central factor to determine whether Ryan succeeds where John Boehner failed.

LATEST ON THE TRUMP FALLOUT:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump in South Carolina (Reuters/Randall Hill)

"I WILL NEVER LEAVE THIS RACE," Trump told my colleagues Steven Ginsberg and Robert Costa over breakfast last week. The full Q&A, with great scenes and fun dialogue, is worth reading .

IS HE SERIOUS?: Trump is again flirting with an independent bid or, at the very least, daring Republican leaders: "A new poll indicates that 68% of my supporters would vote for me if I departed the GOP & ran as an independent," he tweeted last night.

IS TRUMP THE NEW GEORGE WALLACE? Dan Balz, the Post's chief correspondent, floats it on the front page of our paper: "Nothing in modern politics equates with the kind of rhetoric now coming from Candidate Trump. There are no perfect analogies. One must scroll back decades for echoes, however imperfect, of what he is saying, from the populist and racially based appeals of then-Alabama Gov. George Wallace in 1968 and 1972 to the anti-Semitic diatribes of the radio preacher Charles Coughlin during the 1930s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Historian David Kennedy of Stanford University said there are few comparisons, adding that, in branding an entire religious class of people as not welcome, Trump “is further out there than almost anyone in the annals of [U.S.] history.” More of what Professor Kennedy told Dan about Trump: “We’ve known for a long time that we’re just less trustful as a people. We have less confidence in our major institutions and our leaders. … He gets denounced routinely when he does these things and everyone gets up and says this is not a voice we should listen to. But nobody has credibility on the other side. Nobody has the cultural authority to put this guy down. … All the condemnation in the world falls on deaf ears.”

Post columnist Dana Milbank mocks the NRSC for comparing Trump to Wendell Willkie, the 1940 GOP nominee, and argues that he’s a lot more like Benito Mussolini. “And not only because of the superficial: Trump’s chin-out toughness, sweeping right-hand gestures and talk of his ‘huge’ successes and his ‘stupid’ opponents all evoke the Italian dictator’s style.”

HATEFUL WORDS HAVE REAL-LIFE CONSEQUENCES: There here have been two dozen attacks documented against Muslims in the U.S. since the Paris attacks, including a pig's head being thrown at a mosque, according to USA Today . Indiana Democratic Rep. Andre Carson, one of two Muslims in Congress, announced that he received a death threat . He blames politicians for "fanning the flames of bigotry."

MANY REPUBLICANS RESPONDED FORCEFULLY: "This is not conservatism ," said Speaker Paul Ryan. South Carolina Republican Gov. Nikki Haley, a daughter of Indian immigrants, called it "an embarrassment to the Republican Party": "It's absolutely un-American, it's unconstitutional, it defies everything this country was based on and it's just wrong." (Charleston Post and Courier)

BUT SOME GOP LEADERS ARE BEING TEPID: "I don't agree," RNC Chairman Reince Priebus said when asked about the Trump proposal. "We need to aggressively take on radical Islamic terrorism but not at the expense of our American values. That's as far as I'm going to go." If Republicans again blow a winnable presidential election in 2016, that quote will be in autopsies explaining why.

DEMOCRATS CAPITALIZE: Hillary, in an open letter to Muslims , bashed what she called the Republican failure to dismiss Trump's "prejudice and paranoia," by noting other GOP candidates' remarks about the Islamic faith.

Bernie, on "The Tonight Show" last night , ripped into Trump as a "demagogue": "What somebody like a Trump is trying to do is to divide us up. A few months ago, we were supposed to hate Mexicans. He thinks they're all criminals or rapists. Now we're supposed to hate Muslims. And that kind of crap is not going to work in the United States of America."

IS TRUMP GOING TO WALK IT BACK? Trump told ABC's Barbara Walters that his ban would probably be "short term." He added that he has "tremendous relationships" with Muslims and they agree with him "100 percent." He also denied that he is a bigot. "You know when I came out against illegal immigration, everybody said the same thing," he said. "Two weeks later, everybody was on my side, including the members of my own party." The most memorable line from the interview might be him saying, "I'm the worst thing that's ever happened to ISIS."

TRUMP STILL LEADS THE GOP POLLS:

- Cruz vaulted into second place among Republicans in a Suffolk/USA Today national poll, earning 17 percent of likely voters' support behind Trump's 27 percent. Rubio is third at 16 percent, and Carson dropped to 10 percent. (Philip Bump)

- Trump's lead in New Hampshire grew by 6 points, to 32 percent, in a CNN/WMUR poll that was conducted just before the Muslim proposal. He held an 18-point lead over second-place Rubio. (CNN)

A REALLY COOL NEW POLLING TOOL: Morning Consult has built out a free platform called Morning Consult Intelligence that lets anyone search and analyze over 50,000 current and historical survey questions from top polling organizations. It's much more sophisticated than any of the other free tools out there. Researchers can filter based on the polling or media organization and the date of the survey. A post on the Monkey Cage blog explains more on what should be a helpful resource for operatives, journalists and historians.

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Joe Biden, his son and the case against a Ukrainian oligarch," by James Risen: "When Vice President Biden traveled to Kiev, Ukraine, on Sunday for a series of meetings with the country's leaders, one of the issues on his agenda was to encourage a more aggressive fight against Ukraine's rampant corruption and stronger efforts to rein in the power of its oligarchs. But the credibility of the vice president's anticorruption message may have been undermined by the association of his son, Hunter Biden, with one of Ukraine's largest natural gas companies, Burisma Holdings, and with its owner, Mykola Zlochevsky, who was Ukraine's ecology minister under former President Viktor F. Her action came three months after an investor in the mining firm emailed Marc Mezvinsky, Chelsea Clinton's husband and a partner in Eaglevale Partners LP, a New York hedge fund, asking for his help in setting up State Department contacts."

— Wall Street Journal, "Nancy Pelosi drives hard bargain with Paul Ryan on spending, taxes" by Kristina Peterson: "The two House leaders are facing their first serious battle of wills over Congress's pile of year-end legislation. Republicans will grade Ryan, elected speaker in late October, on how many conservative policy measures he manages to attach to the spending bill needed to prevent a shutdown when the government's funding runs out Friday night. Pelosi, determined to block as many GOP policy measures as she can, is demonstrating to the new speaker that Democrats' support on must-pass legislation won't come cheap. As such, she is working to prevent Republicans from securing all but the slimmest of policy victories. … Long known as a tough negotiator, Pelosi has stepped up her efforts in recent days on both the spending bill and legislation addressing a slew of lapsed and expiring tax breaks known as 'extenders.' On the spending bill, she has sought to block all GOP policy measures, or 'riders,' that Democrats don't like."

— Politico, "Cruz takes climate-science detour from campaign trail ," by Darren Goode: "Ted Cruz took a break from the campaign trail on Tuesday to dive headlong into an aggressive Capitol Hill attack on mainstream climate science — the kind his fellow Republican presidential contenders have mainly sought to avoid.
Less than eight weeks before the crucial Iowa caucuses in which he's leading the latest polls, Cruz convened a Senate subcommittee hearing where he criticized environmentalists as 'alarmists' and questioned 'the objectivity of climate research.' Also joining the hearing were a half-dozen Democrats, only too eager to get another chance to lampoon the GOP as a party that opposes science. … Cruz's main thrust was an argument that has long been a talking point among right-wing climate skeptics — that some satellite records show that global temperatures have barely budged since 1998."

— New York Times Magazine, "Trudeau's Canada, again ," by Guy Lawson: "Justin Trudeau, who is 43, was still working on getting his staff to call him 'Prime Minister.' For years, he was 'Justin,' and staff members often still referred to him that way. 'It's like your really smart friend suddenly became prime minister,' Kate Purchase, his communications director, told me. … Pierre Trudeau gave his son a front seat to history. When he was a boy, Justin met Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan (who recited verses from the poem ''The Shooting of Dan McGrew'); Richard Nixon toasted the toddler in Ottawa, predicting he would become prime minister someday. But the younger Trudeau told me he never discussed the subject with his father until the last year of his life. … Justin Trudeau's lack of qualifications to be prime minister were obvious, as was his lack of his father's erudition — but he considers himself to have undergone his own peculiar kind of schooling. Trudeau points out that he has visited nearly 100 countries, many of them for international summit meetings with his father, which provided an intimate understanding of statecraft."

Arnold Schwarzenegger had quite the response to climate change deniers. From Facebook : "There are two doors. Behind Door Number One is a completely sealed room, with a regular, gasoline-fueled car. Behind Door Number Two is an identical, completely sealed room, with an electric car … I'm guessing you chose the Door Number Two, with the electric car, right? Door number one is a fatal choice – who would ever want to breathe those fumes? This is the choice the world is making right now."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Rupert Murdoch calls for a halt to influx of refugees. From the Hollywood Reporter : "Has Trump gone too far?" tweeted the owner of Fox News and the Wall Street Journal, without answering his own question. "Regardless, public is obsessed on radical Muslim dangers, Complete refugee pause to fix vetting makes sense," he wrote. "Hours after his initial post, Murdoch said he was not endorsing Trump, just supporting his idea."

- Scoffs at Obama for saying we should look at environmental concerns, etc. when considering nuclear power

Pottsville, PA: McCain Rally 10/27/08

    - leadership and character to be pres - he has always put his country first
    - lived his life by code of conduct - duty honor - what a wonderful pres. he'll make

Speech Highlights

TY. wont cindy make a great FLOTUS? and wont palin make a great VP? shes smart, tough, reformer, wonderful family person and she'll take on old boy netwrk of DC. ty for your enthusiastic support of her. Todd is 4x snow mobile champ. think anyone in DC coudl scare him or her?

lets start out with a msg tonight: we need to win PA. i need your help over next 8 days so we can bring real change to DC.

some ST: we cant spend next 4 yrs as weve spent last 8. we have to act, we need a new direction and we have to fight for it. ive been fighting ofr this country since i was 17 and i ahve the scars to prove it.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home. no one knows better than you in PA how badly we need to create jobs and get our econ. going again. We're going to double the child deduction for working families. We will cut the capital gains tax. And we will cut business taxes to help create jobs, and keep American businesses in America. [john mccain! john mccain!]

Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse. Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money. Senator Obama will. And he can't do that without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes. DNA of bears or whatever - you will know their names, i will make them famous.

I'm not going to spend $750 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. I'm going to make sure we take care of the working people who were devastated by the excesses of Wall Street and Washington.

I have a plan to fix our housing market, so that your home value doesn't go down when your neighbor defaults, and so that people in danger of defaulting have a path to pay off their loan. so that ppl can achieve american dream of owning a home.

If I'm elected-- when im elected President, we're going to stop spending $700 billion to buy oil from countries that don't like us very much.

in the debate the other night, i talked about how much i admired obama's rhetoric. but you listen to whats behind his words. he said he would "consider" offshore drilling. we talked about nucl, and he said well you have to consider the enviro, and -- that's right, drill baby drill. We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology. let me remind you: the USA sits on worlds largest coal reserves - we can do clean coal and create millions of jbos. i see a few old navy vets - there's 1 from my old ship - we've sailed navy ships around the world w/ nucl plants on them. the french, the japanese, the british. they store and reprocess. 80% of french energy comes from nuclear. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs. millions you know, We've learned more about Senator Obama's real goals for our country over the last two weeks than we learned over the past two years, and that only because Joe the plumber asked him a question in Ohio. That's when Senator Obama revealed -- but not for the first time -- he wants to quote "spread the wealth around."

Now, Joe didn't ask for Senator Obama to come to his house, and he didn't ask to be famous. He certainly didn't ask for the political attacks on him from the Obama campaign. Joe's dream is your dream -- to own a small business that will create jobs, and the attacks on him are an attack on small businesses all over the country. Small businesses employ 84 percent of Americans, and we need to support small businesses, not tax them.

After months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned what Senator Obama's economic goal is: to spread the wealth. In a radio interview revealed today, he said the same thing -- that one of the "tragedies" of the civil rights movement is that it didn't bring about "redistributive change."

You see, Senator Obama believes in redistributing wealth, not in policies that grow our economy and create jobs. He said that even though lower taxes on investment help our economy, he favors higher taxes on investment for quote "fairness." There's nothing "fair" about driving our economy into the ground. We all suffer when that happens, and that is the problem with Senator Obama's approach to our economy. He is more interested in controlling wealth than in creating it ... in redistributing money instead of spreading opportunity. I am going to create wealth for all Americans, by creating opportunity for all Americans.

Senator Obama is running to be Redistributionist in Chief. I'm running to be Commander in Chief. Senator Obama is running to spread the wealth. I'm running to create more wealth. Senator Obama is running to punish the successful. I'm running to make everyone successful.

My opponent's massive new tax increase is exactly the wrong approach in an economic slowdown. The answer to a slowing economy is not higher taxes, but that is exactly what is going to happen when the Democrats have total control of Washington. [boos, someone yells something about "spending!"] We can't let that happen. We need pro-growth and pro-jobs economic policies, not pro-government spending programs paid for with higher taxes.

This is the fundamental difference between Senator Obama and me. We both disagree with President Bush on economic policy. The difference is that he thinks taxes have been too low, and I think that spending has been too high.

If we are going to change Washington, we need a President who has actually fought for change and male it happen. The next President won't have time to get used to the office. We face many challenges here at home, and many enemies abroad in this dangerous world. i will bring our troops home in victory and honor and not in defeat.

just the other day, a couple days ago, Senator Biden warned a group of fatcat contributors out on the W. Coast -- he warned us that Senator Obama would be tested with an international crisis. I have been tested. Senator Obama hasn't. i know how to work with our friends and i know how to treat our enemies. biden is the gift that keeps on giving.

Senator Biden referred to how Jack Kennedy was tested in the Cuban Missile Crisis and I have a little personal experience in that. I was on board the U.S.S. Enterprise, and I sat in a cockpit on the flight deck waiting to take off. We had a target. I know how close we came to a nuclear war and I will not be a president that needs to be tested.

We know Senator Obama won't have the right response to that test, because we've seen the wrong response from him over and over during this campaign. He opposed the surge strategy that is bringing us victory in Iraq and will bring us victory in Afghanistan. He said he would sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators. [boos] When Russia invaded Georgia, Sen. Obama said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all of these. When I am president, we are going to win in Iraq and win in Afghanistan, and our troops will come home in victory and honor.

Let me give you a little straight talk. Let me give you the state of the race today. There's eight days to go. We're a few points down. The pundits have written us off, just like they've done before. My opponent is working out the details with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid of their plans [boos] to raise your taxes, increase spending, and concede defeat in Iraq. He's measuring the drapes, and he's planned his first address to the nation for before the election. [yelling, incl. "let the ppl have a vote!"] I guess I'm old fashioned about these things -- I prefer to let the voters weigh in before presuming the outcome.

What America needs now is someone who will finish the race before the starting the victory lap, someone who will fight to the end, and not for himself but for his country.

I have fought for you most of my life, and in places where defeat meant more than returning to the Senate. [yelling] There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to back down when the stakes are high.

let me just say to you, I know you're worried. [yelling] America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future.

Let me ask you a few questions real quickly. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I'm an American. You are Americans, and we choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight. [usa! usa!]

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our country and our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for your children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go out win this election in PA and get this country moving again.

God bless you, god bless you all, and god bless the USA.

PREPARED REMARKS
We are in the greatest financial crisis of our lifetimes. Congressional inaction has put every American and the entire economy at the gravest risk. Yesterday the country and the world looked to Washington for leadership, and Congress once again came up empty-handed.

I am disappointed at the lack of resolve and bipartisan good will among members of both parties to fix this problem. Bipartisanship is a tough thing; never more so when you're trying to take necessary but publicly unpopular action. But inaction is not an option.

Businesses all over the country cannot borrow to finance their own operations and pay their bills. If we do nothing, many may fail.

Sonic Corporation, a drive-in restaurant chain based in Oklahoma, learned on Thursday that one of its lenders, GE Capital, had stopped extending new loans to the chain's franchisees. That will block plans to rebuild restaurants, add equipment and open new locations. When small businesses like Sonic franchisees can't borrow, contractors don't get the remodeling work, equipment-makers lose sales, and restaurants go out of business. It hurts the entire community.

When financing dries up, students can't get loans.

In Wisconsin, more than 100 Milwaukee Area Technical College students couldn't access private loans to fund their education. Fortunately the school was able to come up with emergency loans, but this temporary arrangement cannot continue. Markets need to work so that people can get financial help and students can be educated.

Again, inaction is not an option.

In light of the House's failure to act, this morning, I spoke to the President about two things that the administration has not done, but should do following the inaction of Congress:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First, the Treasury has already used its Exchange Stabilization Fund to back money market accounts. I encourage it to use it this fund as creatively as possible to provide backstop for accounts across our financial system to maintain confidence on the part of savers and investors.

And second, the recent housing bill gave the government nearly $1 trillion in authority to purchase mortgages. Housing and mortgages are at the root of this crisis. I encourage Treasury to take action to shore up mortgage values.

The Administration can take these actions with the stroke of the pen to help alleviate the crisis gripping our economy. I urge them to do so.

Also, the FDIC should quickly be granted the authority to increase the deposit insurance cap from $100,000 to $250,000 so that families do not have to worry about their money. We cannot allow a crisis in our financial system to become a crisis in confidence.

I call on everyone in Washington to come together in a bipartisan way to address this crisis. I know that many of the solutions to this problem may be unpopular, but the dire consequences of inaction will be far more damaging to the economic security of American families and the fault will be all ours.

I will continue to do whatever I can to aid in a constructive answer to the challenge before us.

- TY all for being here
- i planned to be here to discuss challenges to businesses small and large, esp in Midwest
- btw i'm happy to be in Des Moines, in IA
- My father was born in Council Bluffs. but in full disclosure, my grandparents were travelling at the time. i can't claim too much in that respect, except the pleasure of visiting this great state. I <3 IA state fair, its food and boar.
- it's heartalnd of america, where economy rests and values rest--
- interested in hearing from ppl who contribute so much to our economy
- this may be and is the greatest financial crisis of our lives -- we have to act and do it together in bipartisan fashion - im committed to that -- plenty of time for blame, and ill talk about that, the failings of Fannie/Freddie, and the failins of Wall St and in DC -- but now we need to hear what ppl have to say

- MIRIAM ERICKSON BROWN: many assue that business owners like me will vote GOP and my employees will vote Dem. our employees make $50 - 60k / year. what would you say to them for why they should follow their leadership?
    - we are facing high fuel costs, 625 employees. 3rd-generation family own. we face high HC-- costs increased 40%. and high milk prices.
    - MCCAIN: impossible for you to pass all those costs onto the consumer?
    - ERICKSON BROWN: yes, milk costs, fuel costs (transportation)
    - MCCAIN: has that caused you not to hire?
    - ERICKSON BROWN: yes, we've had to pull out of some places of distribution, we can't afford all the places b/c of fuel. we've done less innovation b/c our costs are concentrated elsewhere.
    - MCCAIN: had to lay off?
    - ERICKSON BROWN: no, but we aren't hiring.
    - MCCAIN: i'll address cost of fuel and transportation and price of pkging. it all has to do with cost of energy. there's no doubt we're transferring $700B / yr to buy oil from countries that don't like us very much. our dependence has grown dramatically rather than setting onto energy indep. it's all of the above, all of the ways in which we can generate energy sources within the USA and eliminate this dependence. nuclear pwr is controversial in some minds. but we can store and reprocess. the british, french and japanese all reprocess. it's a security issue that we have spent nuclear fuels stored outside nucl pwr plants - that's a natl security risk. nuclear pwr isnt only answer, but it reduces greenhouse gas emissions.
    - MCCAIN: despite what may have been said by someone else, we'll have to continue to build clean coal plants so we don't continue polluting and making greenhouse gases. as we achieve energy indep, we'll lower costs of fuel. offshore drilling has to be done now. it can be a bridge as we exploit off our coasts.
    - MCCAIN: we need to develop flex fuels, hybrid, hydrogen, batteries. the key to american economy rests in part in developing these. we are most innovative. we can do it. it'll create millions of jobs. i want you to have capability to transport your high-bulk product in ways taht are clean, energy-efficient and not foreign-dependent. ppl say we cant, we can do this. id be glad to talk about other problems we face. energy indep is key to reduce costs, american economy and make sure we're not dependent on ppl like Chavez and Mid East

- RICHARD JURGERS: fuel costs. our customers see impact of higher gas prices at pump but don't see how that affects other things. we've had unprecedented rises in costs from pkging to transportation, and we have no choice but to pass it on. american consumers hurt
    - MCCAIN: i don't support subsidies for ethanol. i support ethanol. i don't support tariff on imported sugar. the brazilians have been able to adopt flex fuel policy so that majority of cars are fueled by sugar-based, corn-based ethanol. we have to give ppl choice at pump. the more available, teh lower the cost will be.
    - MCCAIN: also, if detroit, which is now developing automobiles, e.g. the Volt, that is incredible step fwd in technology -- if they produce these new, and im confident they will, we ought ot give voter credit, incentive to buy it. and i'm confident it'll happen soon. and soon we'll have battery-powered cars. im confident that with right kind of incentives and tech and the smartest, most productive nation in world, we'll regain the lead and create millions of jobs. same question-- what has this done to your ability to have new employees?
    - JURGERS: we've been blessed, we're employee-owned. we added 2500 jobs last yr and anticipate 200 or so more this yr. we've been able to navigate trouble waters, we're proud. it's caused us to adjust our market strategies

- TOM GODLASKY (CEO of Aviva, 5th lgest ins. co in world, HQ'd in London, publicly-owneD). we've been very fortunate that US business growing rapidly. but we've gone from credit crisis to liquidity crisis. if we can get liquidity down to Main St, these businesses will get us out of troubled times. we need govt action, but we also need to have loans available and made.
    - MCCAIN: we are seeing a dramatic reduction in liquidity and avail. of credit. its reaching now a pt that we're hearing ppl who are applying for loans for new car are being denied or temst too onerous. is that your experience?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- GODLASKY: while we've been fortunate to date, the consumer will sit on their hands. and they should. theyre uncertain about their financial futures. times will change but if we can encourage liquidity to flow to Main St, itll make time shorter.
- MCCAIN: 1 of the reasons Congress failed to act effectively is b/c it hasnt sunk in that the ppl being hurt are Main St, the engine of our economy, faMain St being able to stay in homes, buy new home, new car; sm businesses. credit drying up. there's a perception that this is just for Wall St. i don't want to give anything to Wall St. i want the exec pay to anyone involved to be at level of highest-paid govt work. we need accountability, transparency. WHEN the economy recovers, taxpayer should be first person paid back. i think the american ppl are beginning to understand. unfortunately we are trying to fix the blame rather the problem. the time to put politics aside is certainly long past.
- GODLASKY: the mark-to-market balance sheets has been raising questions, but you need 2 sides of a market. if you don't, you have a depressed market, with domino effect.
- MCCAIN: many believe that has been difficulties more daunting in getting back to recovery. but we want to avoid errors of past that allows some to have more liquidity than they actually did. 1 idea is a freer avg. what do you think? we don't want to tell americans that somethigns being improperly valued.
- GODLASKY: even in times of duress now where it's undervalued, so to get some sort of rolling 3-yr avg has some value. we're trying to avoid either/or, inflated avg or more depressed.
- MCCAIN: there has to be greater transparency w/ any measure of this nature b/c ppl will be skeptical. i think it ought to be somethign considered.

- LARRY ZIMPLEMAN (CEO of Fortune 250 company): I appreciate all your earlier comments about importance of Washington acting quickly. about making sure Americans connect Wall ST with Main St, we're 1 of leaders in America in 401k plans. and we estimated that yesterday, in midst of Wall Street correction, 401k account lost like $850B in value while debating a $700b value.

  - MCCAIN: i was told overall $1.3T
  - ZIMPLEMAN: this are for avg investors, not Wall Street titans.
  - MCCAIN: Can you give example of avg loss?
  - ZIMPLEMAN: 5% down. if you had $100k in account yesterday, you had $95k by end. you contributed $5k yesterday (laughs)
  - MCCAIN: YTD?
  - ZIMPLEMAN: Since last August, 20-25% decline. Liek you, i'm optimistic. my question is about regulatory structure we have. we happen to be in ins, but also regulated by SEC and banking. what are your thoughts about current structure? natl regulators and state regulators? questions about efficiency and oversight. better ways to reform regulatory oversight?
  - MCCAIN: most of these agencies were designed for very different economy. now in global econ @ speed of light. now they're stovepiped while there's been merging of transactions and interests. so we have alphabet soup of agencies, which has to be reformed and merged. Paulson, when he took over, 1 of first proposals was to streamline and update these agencies, to make them more efficient. i hope we'll be looking carefully at that. also, 1 other aspect: it's time we held ppl accountable, whether in ballot booth or their holding of appointed offices. theres' a time i recall where ppl were held accountable-- they mightve been good ppl, but if they didnt carry out their responsbilities effectively, then we found someone else to do the job. i believe SEC chair didnt carry out the job well, so as fine a person as he is, we ought to hold ppl accountable. (applause) voters hold elected officials accountable. we should hold appointees accountable.
  - ZIMPLEMAN: i wont render my personal opinion on Cox. but voters have been behind trend of where problem was. it actually started with residential mortgages. how can you do a financial crisis when you cant even put a reasonable price on securities. i support the criticisMain St of Cox and i still dont know that theyve gotten up to the curve.
  - MCCAIN: other factor is the cozy relationship b/t execs at Freddie and Fannie and members of Congress. i did a couple yrs ago speak up and supported legislation that was successfully stymied by special inteersts and we're paying heavy price.

- DON LAMBERO: the markets for capital wasnt best when we started but we found a way to get loans to build a chain, always with idea to take it public. that wasnt possible until Reagan became President, and the markets opened and we were able to take our idea to the marketplace. i worry that in today's market, a person will not be able to take their idea to marketplace. can we get thru this such that there will be money for entrepreneur to take their ideas to market place?

  - MCCAIN: we can and we must b/c they're the american dream adn we don't want to throttle that or restrict. at the same time, we have severe crisis of confidence among Americans that this is system that doesnt take care of fatcats on Wall Street but takes care of ppl like yourself on Main St. we have to go to american ppl and make sure they have the confidence that the changes we make will be to their benefit and not for Wall Street or insiders. thats the key. this is a situation where failure is not an option. b/c the consequences of us not fixing this situation and restoring confidence-- i don't think, if we pass this legislation, which is not perfect, that we would've ever fixed $350B. b/c we wouldve spent money and restored confidence. so

- AL JENNINGS: i represent the host of this event. a # of employees represent our jobs, we're private company, more than half our earnings will come from export business this yr. fuel costs up our costs, steel costs also went up dramatically adn that's a major raw material for us.

  - MCCAIN: who's your major competitor worldwide?
  - JENNINGS: # of competitors in US. worldwide, germany and europe.
  - MCCAIN: do you have unfair competition?
  - JENNINGS: you're talking about china. we literally refuse to go to china. there are 2 major trade shows going to china. we've sent 2 reps, 1 who speaks fluent chinese and 1 who can relay Main Stg back to us. we're afraid of us.
  - JENNINGS: fiscal YTD we're up more worldwide that in US. our business trails economic cycle. we're in paper as concrete company, we havent poured concrete for 50 yrs. they still don't know what we do.
  - MCCAIN: they don't appreciate what i do either.
  - JENNINGS: we're primary supplier of Freedom Towers. and to repair bridge in MN.
  - MCCAIN: you should be very proud of that.
  - JENNINGS; nucl pwr is an absolute must and as soon as we can get ppl to recognize, we have companies that are preparing construction of them, but we need that support for this to happen. when you have all these serviceppl in the country but they're not procducing anything worthwhile, we're all out of it.
  - MCCAIN: energy indep means jobs and econ growth and stopping exodus of $700B of your money per year. i congratulate you JENNINGS, on your success. exports are key to our econ recovery. we shouldnt practice protectionism, we should open global markets and compete all over world. some don't give us a level playing field and we need to prosecute when that happens. but overall we need to understnad importance of free trade.

HILLARY CLINTON'S REMARKS ON RACE AND OUR CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

BACKGROUND: At an event Tuesday in New York for the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights, Hillary Clinton once again addressed the issue of race relations and our criminal justice system in light of recent events in Ferguson, Missouri and Staten Island. She addressed this issue in Boston earlier this month, as well as in San Francisco this summer.

Highlights from Hillary's remarks on December 16, 2014:

"We can stand up together and say 'Yes, black lives matter.'"

"[Robert Kennedy] understood everyone in every community benefitted when there is respect for the law, and when everyone in every community is respected by the law."

"Policies, politics, priorities matter, but values matter even more. And it is possible…to restore a sense of community and potential to families struggling, worrying, disappointed, discouraged, revitalizing and re-stitching the fraying fabric of American life. It is possible to keep us safe from terrorism and reduce crime and violence without relying on torture abroad or unnecessary force or excessive incarceration at home."

"African American men are still far more likely to be stopped and searched by the police, charged with crimes, and sentenced to longer prison terms…a third of all black men face the prospect of prison during their lifetimes, and by some estimates, young black men are more than 20 times more likely to be shot dead by a police officer than a young white man."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We know that there are so many police officers out there every day inspiring trust and confidence, rather than fear and frustration; honorably doing their duty; putting themselves on the line to save lives, not take them. We can build on that. We can work to restore the balance to our public life, our economy."

Highlights from Hillary's remarks on December 4, 2014:

"I know that a lot of hearts are breaking, and we are asking ourselves, 'Aren't these our sons? Aren't these our brothers?'"

"Each of us has to grapple with some hard truths about race and justice in America…When one stops and realizes a third of all Black men face the prospect of prison during their lifetimes, what devastating consequences that has for their families, and their communities, and all of us."

"We have allowed our criminal justice system to get out of balance. And I personally hope that these tragedies give us the opportunity to come together as a nation to find our balance again."

"I'm very pleased that the Department of Justice will be investigating what happened in Ferguson or Staten Island. Those families and those communities and our country deserve a full and fair accounting as well as whatever substantive reforms are necessary to ensure equality, justice, and respect for every citizen…I support the President's announcement of a task force on policing."

"We all know there are decent, honorable, brave police officers out in our communities every single day, inspiring trust and confidence rather than fear and frustration. So let's learn from the best examples. Let's invest in what works."

"The most important thing each of us can do is to try even harder to see the world through our neighbors' eyes. To imagine what it is like to walk in their shoes, to share their pain and their hopes and their dreams. These tragedies did not happen in some far-away place. They didn't happen to some other people. These are our streets, our children, our fellow Americans, and our grief…We are all in this together, we can all do better."

Highlights from Hillary's remarks on August 28, 2014:

- "Watching the recent funeral for Michael Brown, as a mother, as a human being, my heart just broke for his family because losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss."
- "This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray. Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone, not in America. We are better than that."
- "We cannot ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system. Inequities that undermine our most deeply held values of fairness and equality."
- "Imagine what we would feel and what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around. If white offenders received prison sentences ten percent longer than black offenders for the same crimes. If a third of all white men – just look at this room and take one-third – went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that. That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans and so many of the communities in which they live."
- "I applaud President Obama for sending the Attorney General to Ferguson and demanding a thorough and speedy investigation. That's both appropriate and necessary to find out what happened, to see that justice is done, to help this community begin healing itself."
- "It was 51 years ago today that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. called us to live out the true meaning of our creed, to make the dream real for all Americans. And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in the hot August sun all those years ago. So we have a lot of work to do together."

Hillary Clinton Denounces the Use of Torture by United States

Background: At an event honoring her deep commitment to human rights, Hillary Clinton spoke forcefully on Tuesday regarding the use of torture by the United States. Her remarks were given at a speech at the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights Gala. Her speech followed the release of a report on the CIA's interrogation methods. 12/14

- Clinton denounced the practice of torture by the United States and advocated for laws that ban torture.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Clinton emphasized that the practice of torture is not in line with the values for which our country stands.As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton consistently opposed the use of torture by the United States. 12/09

- Clinton said that the U.S. must hold itself accountable to the same international law that it holds other nations - including a ban on torture.

- Clinton said the U.S. would participate in the U.N.'s Universal Periodic Review of its own human rights record.

As Senator, Hillary Clinton condemned the Bush Administration's use of torture to fight terrorism and wrote that torture does not reliably assist our intelligence community. 11/07 10/07

In Hillary Clinton's memoir, Hard Choices, she praised President Obama's 2009 executive order banning torture.

Remarks of Hillary Clinton Following Release of CIA Torture Report at RFK Center for Justice and Human Rights Gala:

- "Yes, the threat of terrorism is real and urgent, scores of children were just murdered in Pakistan, beheadings in the Middle East, a siege in Sydney, these tragedies not only break hearts but should steel our resolve and underscore that our values are what set us apart from our adversaries."

    - "Today we can say again in a loud and clear voice, the United States should never condone or practice torture anywhere in the world."

    - "That should be absolutely clear as a matter of both policy and law, including our international treaty obligations, and if that requires new legislation, then Congress should work with President Obama to quickly enact it and it shouldn't be an issue of partisan politics."

- "America is at our best when our actions match our values."

Remarks of Hillary Clinton as Secretary of State on Use of Torture by United States:

- The U.S. "can and must do a better job of addressing the mistaken belief that these tactics are ever permissible." 6/7/12

- "When nations violate human rights and undermine the rule of law, even in the pursuit of terrorists, it feeds radicalization, gives propaganda tools to the extremists, and ultimately undermines our efforts. The international community cannot turn our eyes away from the effects of these tactics because they are part of the problem." 6/7/12

- "By holding ourselves accountable, we reinforce our moral authority to demand that all governments adhere to obligations under international law; among them, not to torture." 12/14/09

Remarks of Hillary Clinton as Senator on Use of Torture by United States:

- "Torture 'cannot be American policy. Period." 10/4/07

- "Torture is morally wrong. It is against the law. It betrays our most fundamental values, damages our credibility around the world, and harms U.S. national security." 5/17/08

- Torture "does not bear reliable fruit in intelligence gathering." 10/4/07]

- "The world we want is also a world where human rights are respected. By surrendering our values in the name of our safety, the Bush administration has left Americans wondering whether its rhetoric about freedom around the world still applies back home. We have undercut international support for fighting terrorism by suggesting that the job cannot be done without humiliation, infringements on basic rights to privacy and free speech, and even torture."

Excerpt by Hillary Clinton in Hard Choices memoir on President Obama's Torture Ban:

- "In 2009, there was no denying that our country's approach to human rights had gotten somewhat out of balance. On his second full day in office President Obama issued an executive order prohibiting the use of torture or official cruelty by any U.S. official and ordered the closure of Guantánamo Bay (a goal that has not yet been achieved). He pledged to put human rights back at the heart of our foreign policy."

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

BACKGROUND: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that hardworking Americans can succeed. In uncertain times, families need faith that opportunity for their children and grandchildren is alive and well. Hillary Clinton wants the American Dream to be a real possibility for every child and every family across our nation.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families. Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and corporations in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

- Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

BOTTOM LINE: Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, fighting to increase wages, strongly advocating for progressive tax policies and access to education and healthcare to help middle-class families – Hillary Clinton has fought for an America and a future where everyone can rise to their potential.

HILLARY CLINTON'S RECENT STATEMENTS ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

In her many public appearances over the past year, Hillary Clinton has continued to advocate for the middle class by sharing her vision all over the country:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a speech to a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf, "Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start.'" According to Politico, Clinton "gave one of her strongest political speeches since her 2008 campaign ended in June 2008 as she headlined a women-focused event for Democratic gubernatorial Tom Wolf in Pennsylvania. Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start,' as well as women's pay equity and her gauzy first days as a new grandmother. For the first time in months, Clinton's public talk was neither a dry recitation of public policy nor a self-reflection about her tenure as secretary of state." [Politico , 10/9/14]

Clinton's language at a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf was "some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class." According to Politico, "The remarks were some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class. They came after she was accused of being out of touch for her comment in June about being 'dead broke' when she left the White House, and for giving paid speeches at exorbitant prices." [Politico, 10/9/14]

The theme of Clinton's speech at an event for Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Tom Wolf was working families. According to BuzzFeed, "The thread running through Clinton's message here in Pennsylvania, the state she won six years ago in a primary against Barack Obama, was working families — a theme she teased repeatedly throughout her speech with populist undertones, mentions of her granddaughter, and stories about her own trips as a child to Scranton, where Clinton's father, Hugh, was born to a working-class immigrant family." [BuzzFeed , 9/9/14]

In Pennsylvania, Clinton criticized the power of corporations, siding with middle-class families. According to the Wall Street Journal, "Though she and her husband have raised more than $1 billion from U.S. companies and corporate officials over the last two decades, Mrs. Clinton signaled that she sided with everyday families struggling to pay bills and keep afloat. Corporations, she said, 'seem to have all the rights, but none of the responsibilities of people …' She decried practices that pay women less than men for the same work and took aim at politicians who've belittled women's rights. 'A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families,' she said." [Wall Street Journal , 9/9/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she would fight to restore and re-open the middle class. According to TPM, "The notion of 'upward mobility' was central to Clinton's message to the New American audience in May. She described it as 'time-tested wisdom' that was 'at the heart of what I believe is the basic bargain of America.'… Here is how Clinton described that basic bargain of America, as she sees it, in May: 'No matter who you are or where you come from, if you work hard and play by the rules, you'll have the opportunity to build a good life for yourself and your family.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she can address income inequality and gender inequality. According to TPM, "So income inequality has been a big part of the message. But it's also been married to inequality between the sexes. At both the New American and CAP events, the same factoid made an appearance: That three-quarters of jobs that rely on tips -- like 'waiters, bartenders and hairstylists' as she said on both occasions -- are held by women…. And she said Thursday that these issues should be used to mobilize voters -- in the 2014 midterms and moving forward." [TPM , 9/22/14]

In recent speeches, Clinton has taken a tougher stance on big business, likely in "an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism" she may need in 2016, according to Reuters. According to Reuters, "Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country…. This is a change of tone for the former New York senator, who faced criticism for her Wall Street ties as recently as September, after appearing with Goldman Sachs (GS.N) chief executive Lloyd Blankfein. Allies and analysts see it as an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism that Clinton may need in order to broaden her appeal in a potential 2016 Democratic primary contest." [Reuters , 11/2/14]

During a New Hampshire midterm event, Clinton discussed expanding economic opportunity and raising the minimum wage. According to the Boston Globe, "Clinton spoke in New Hampshire about expanding economic opportunity, raising the minimum wage, and protecting women's rights. She acknowledged that, across the country, there is 'a lot of anxiety and insecurity.' But the former secretary of state and US senator from New York struck a hopeful note: She bookended her remarks talking about her new granddaughter and said seeing another generation in the family focuses the mind on what's important. Clinton said she and her husband were raised to believe the American Dream was within your reach if you worked hard. 'You should not,' Clinton told a packed gymnasium, 'have to be the grandchild of a governor or a senator or a former secretary of state or a former president to believe that the American Dream is in your reach.'" [Boston Globe , 11/2/14]

In midterm campaign appearances, Clinton has been echoing populist notes. According to Bloomberg, Clinton "has been sounding more populist notes of late as a campaign-trail advocate for Democratic candidates who are on the ballot next week. That's an important turn as she contemplates a run for president in 2016 because Clinton's biggest weakness among Democrats, and some Republicans, is the perception that she's too close to Wall Street and corporate America…. And the more anti-corporate tone is pleasing to the ears of liberals who have pined for Senator Elizabeth Warren, a scourge of Wall Street banks, to challenge Clinton for the Democratic nomination. And, they say, it's a message Clinton can use against Republicans because many in the GOP have turned wary of Wall Street and big corporations since the 2008 financial crash." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

During a midterm appearance in New York, Clinton clarified earlier comments about companies and job creation, while maintaining the same theme: "Clinton's for the little guy." According to Bloomberg, "Days after Republicans feasted on her claim that corporations don't create jobs, Hillary Clinton tried Monday to 'be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades.' 'So-called trickle-down economics has failed,' Clinton said as she stumped for Representative Sean Patrick Maloney in New York. 'Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out–not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.' While campaigning Friday for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, Clinton created a stir–and drew criticism from Republicans–by saying, 'Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs.'…The cleaned-up message, though, hits at the same theme: Clinton's for the little guy." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

While campaigning for Democrats in the midterm election, Clinton frequently tells voters that "everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance." According to a CNN, an investigation into Clinton's most common lines on the trail found that Clinton frequently tells voters, "'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance...' Clinton has focused a great deal on economic populism on the stump, an issue other Democrats thinking about seeking the presidency in 2016 have started to tweak Clinton on. 'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance to keep going and to make something of themselves,' Clinton said in Iowa earlier this year. 'That was one of the most important lessons of my life.' Clinton usually uses the line to encourage compassion from a crowd, and to show that she has compassion, too." [CNN , 10/28/14]

In a San Francisco speech, Clinton revealed some of what may be her economic message: "Who's on your side?" According to the Washington Post, "Here in San Francisco on Monday, Clinton gave a spirited call to arms to Democrats as she road-tested what is likely to be her economic message if she runs again. The November midterms, she said, come down 'to a simple question: Who's on your side?' She sounded close to her party's populist marrow when she decried the erosion of economic security for many working Americans, and a long way from her tone-deaf remark earlier this year about being 'dead broke' when she and Bill Clinton left the White House in 2000. 'It's time to elect leaders who will fight for everyone to get a fair shot at the American dream,' Hillary Clinton said." [Washington Post , 10/21/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she could finish the economic recovery begun by Obama. According to TPM, "Clinton seems to have a handle of the line she wants to toe: Obama saved us from worse economic struggles (as his defenders have been saying for years), but the work isn't over. Implicit, of course, is that she -- if she runs -- would finish the job. 'We haven't seen a full recovery from the economic crash,' Clinton said Thursday at CAP. 'When the president came in, he deserves an enormous amount of credit for staunching the bleeding and preventing a further deterioration and getting us out of that ditch we were in. But we know unless we change our policies, a lot of the benefits are not going to be broadly shared.' 'It's not just about more jobs for more people and better paying jobs,' she said. 'It's making sure that the people themselves get to keep those benefits and build that future back that they are so desperate to see for themselves.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

In an interview with PBS this summer, Hillary said : "Bill and I have had terrific opportunities, both of us…have worked hard, but we've been grateful for everything that we've been able to achieve, and sadly that's just not true for most Americans today…It's important that we all try to figure out what we're going to do, and that's what I've done my entire life, fighting for a higher minimum wage, or family leave…equal pay for equal work…I think my record speaks for itself."

At a speech at the Aspen Ideas Festival in June, Hillary said : "At the end of the day, we're all on the same team. We're on the American team. And we've got to do a better job of getting our economy growing again and producing results and renewing the American Dream so that Americans feel that they have a stake in the future and that the economy and the political system is not stacked against them, because that will erode the trust that is at the basis of our democracy."

ELEVEN THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT HILLARY

Secretary Clinton helped restore America's leadership and standing in the world during a time of global challenges and changes. Secretary Clinton worked tirelessly to revitalize American diplomacy and strengthen alliances by traveling nearly a million miles for hundreds of meetings with foreign leaders in 112 countries. As America's lead diplomat, Secretary Clinton understood the importance of engaging the public and took diplomacy directly to people around the world. Just as she was as a senator, Secretary Clinton was a workhorse, often taking on difficult challenges and addressing them directly around the world.

Secretary Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history. Secretary Clinton helped impose the toughest sanctions in Iran's history by getting Russia and China on board. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial board noted that, "Clinton surely pulled out every stop to get Russia and particularly China…on board." And as Howard Dean recently told CNN , "Hillary Clinton cranked up the sanctions for the first time under President Obama that actually made the Iranians come to the table."

Secretary Clinton played an integral role in the New START Treaty with Russia. Secretary Clinton played an active role in reaching a missile reduction agreement with Russia, working to push it through the Senate and securing more than the necessary two-thirds majority. She entered the treaty into force in Munich with her Russian counterpart. As a result of the treaty's passage, there will be fewer nuclear missile launchers . Simply put, the world is safer.

Secretary Clinton supported the raid that brought Osama bin Laden to justice. As NBC's Brian Williams reported on his website, "Secretary of Defense Robert Gates recommended an air strike with no forces on the ground. CIA Director Panetta supported a raid by Special Forces and so did Secretary of State Clinton."

Secretary Clinton helped avert all-out war in Gaza by negotiating a cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians. In November 2012, after eight days of violence, Secretary Clinton negotiated a Gaza cease-fire with Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi. In an article titled "Hillary Clinton scores Gaza cease fire success," Politico noted that, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a Gaza cease-fire right at the moment hope seemed dead for a rapid end to the violence…"

Secretary Clinton played a role in bringing one war to an end and planning for the end of another. Working closely with Department of Defense colleagues and as part of the President's national security team, Secretary Clinton played a role in the end of war in Iraq and in beginning a transition in Afghanistan, with all NATO allies having agreed to stand-up a post withdrawal support plan. As President Obama told 60 Minutes , it was "all a consequence of the great work that Hillary did and her team did and the State Department did in conjunction with our national security team."

Secretary Clinton was critical in America's "pivot to Asia" strategy. As Martin Indyk of the Brookings Institute wrote in Foreign Policy, "The 'pivot' to East Asia will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement… [but] it is Clinton's too. She laid the groundwork, built the relationships, and developed the complex architecture of the new strategy — and she turned up at that pivotal moment in Vietnam in July 2010 to declare the U.S. commitment to the region." Secretary Clinton earned praise for her work in opening up Burma, a place that had not been visited by a Secretary of State in 50 years.

Secretary Clinton worked to build the coalition to oust Qadhafi and stop massacres in Libya. As the Washington Post reported upon the end of NATO operations in Libya, "U.S. officials and key allies are offering a detailed new defense of the approach and Clinton's pivotal role – both within a divided Cabinet and a fragile, assembled-on-the-fly international alliance. What emerges from these accounts is a picture of Clinton using her mixture of political pragmatism and tenacity to referee spats among NATO partners, secure crucial backing from Arab countries and tutor rebels on the fine points of message management."

Secretary Clinton engaged in economic statecraft. Secretary Clinton's focus on economic engagement resulted in increased investment through three new free trade agreements (Colombia ,Panama and South Korea) and 15 Open Skies agreements including with Japan, Brazil, Saudi Arabia and Israel.

Secretary Clinton brought the State Department into the 21st Century. Secretary Clinton helped the State Department adapt to emerging issues such as cyber security by creating the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online. She recognized the important role of energy in U.S. foreign policy and helped create the Bureau of Energy Resources to protect our energy infrastructure and influence how nations move to cleaner fuel.

Secretary Clinton elevated the cause of women's rights to new heights. Secretary Clinton recognized women's rights as a major foreign policy issue. It is, according to Newsweek, the area of "hardships faced by women and girls across the world–that her impact has been most profound." Hillary convinced the White House to allow her to create a new position at the State Department: Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues. Newsweek continued, "Across the world, in diverse and deeply reactionary cultures, Clinton and [Ambassador-at-Large] Verveer have spoken and fought to liberalize attitudes on women's role in the economy, girls' schooling, women's health, domestic violence, issues arising from war and conflict, and myriad other concerns."

Subject:	[big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Five Reasons We Can't Trust Romney With Our National Security

Five Reasons We Can't Trust Romney With Our National Security

The events of the last forty-eight hours have made it indisputably clear: America cannot trust Mitt Romney and Paul Ryan with our national security.

This morning's Huffington Post headline summarized what it called, "The Verdict: Most Craven and Ill-Advised Move…Not Worthy of A President… Bungle… Utter Disaster…. Not Presidential… Lehman Moment… Over the Top… Desperate;…Awesomely Awful".

Notwithstanding the horrible reviews, Romney and his campaign tripled down on their criticism of President Obama and the American diplomats who were on the ground and about to come under attack.

Romney's Neo-Con foreign policy adviser, Richard Williamson, told the *Washington Post*that, "There is a pretty compelling story that if you had a President Romney, you'd be in a different situation." He's right about that. We'd be in a very different and dangerous situation if Mitt Romney were in charge of American national security. There are at least five reasons why every American should be frightened at the prospect of Mitt Romney as Commander-in-Chief.

1). Mitt Romney has no guiding principles when it comes to foreign policy – or anything else for that matter – but one: his own personal ambition. Tuesday night Romney demonstrated once again that he would take any cheap shot that he thought would serve his ambition to be President, regardless of its impact on American national security or our people on the ground.

Of course this is nothing new. Romney has demonstrated time and time again that he has no lasting commitment to principle whatsoever. He has gone from being pro-choice to ardently anti-abortion; morphed from a Massachusetts moderate to a "severe conservative"; demonstrated his willingness to buy companies, load them with debt, bleed them dry and destroy the lives of workers and communities all to make money for himself and his investors.

After favoring immigration reform in the past, Romney became the most anti-immigrant major Presidential candidate in modern history.

Romney drafted and passed RomneyCare and then promised to repeal a similar bill when one was passed by President Obama and a Democratic Congress. Why? Because that's what thought was necessary to get the Republican nomination for President.

Romney has no North Star guiding his behavior except his desire to enhance his own personal wealth and his own driving ambition.

Someone like that is the last guy you want trust to make the tough decisions to protect American national security. Great statesmen are people who think more about the next generation than the next election. They are people who are willing to take the political heat because they are committed to doing what is right to protect the American people. They are heroes of John Kennedy's Profiles in Courage, not the men described in John Dean's book on the Nixon White House, Blind Ambition.

2). Mitt Romney has no vision. In his acceptance speech to the Republican Convention he made fun of President Obama's concern for global climate change and his commitment toward the elimination of nuclear weapons. Romney actually opposed passage of the START II Treaty with Russia that reduced nuclear weapons to their current levels.

Romney flat-out opposes -- makes fun of -- investments in renewable energy sources that would begin the process of freeing us from the tyranny of Big Oil – and oil dictators – and addresses the problem of climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rather than support movements to limit the exploding growth in the world's population, Romney actually opposes support for birth control.

Have you ever heard word one from Romney about protecting our natural resources, or investment in de-salinization, or strengthening the international co-operation needed to deal with cyber-security, or frankly any of these critical issues?

Mitt Romney seems to have absolutely no interest in or knowledge of history or the forces that are changing the world. And he certainly has never expressed a long-term view of how he might hope to shape the world as President of the United States. Let's face it, the guy is shallow.

Voters correctly want leaders with vision, because as the great baseball player Yogi Berra used to say: "If you don't know where you're going, any road will take you there."

3). The Romney-Ryan team has less experience in foreign policy than any two candidates for America's top offices since World War II.

Barry Goldwater may have scared the bejesus out of many Americans, but at least he was a Lt. Colonel in the Army Air Corp during World War II and had served on the Armed Services Committee in the Senate.

When Senator Barack Obama ran for President, he chose the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Joe Biden, as his running mate.

Collectively Mitt Romney and Paul Ryan have zero foreign policy experience. And it shows.

4). Romney has demonstrated he has no capacity to empathize with other people. He has no idea how to put himself in their shoes – or even to understand how they hear the things he is saying. That's one of the main reasons why, as Senator Kerry said at the Democratic Convention, Romney's "foreign policy tour" earlier this summer was more like a "blooper reel." It's why, when it comes to foreign affairs, Romney is a bull in the china closet.

Romney seems incapable of understanding that when you're asked about your opinion of preparations for the London Olympics in London days before the event, the Brits might be offended when (presumably to demonstrate how much he knew about running Olympic games) he questioned their readiness. He apparently had no clue that Palestinians might take offense when he said he thought that their economic problems stemmed from their "culture."

Romney is typical of wealthy people who think they are very "cosmopolitan" because they can jet around the world and stay in first class hotels, but don't have a clue how normal people – or other cultures – experience the world. He is upper-class parochial. He thinks everyone thinks and talks and believes the same way as his classmates at prep school or colleagues in the Bain boardroom.

5). Romney has surrounded himself with many of the same Neo-Con foreign policy advisers that got America into the horrific War in Iraq. One of those advisers, Richard Williamson, actually had the audacity to argue that "respect for America has gone down" under President Obama. Maybe in some parallel universe.

In fact, every international poll showed that George Bush, Dick Cheney and their Neo-Con crew caused respect for the United States to plummet to new lows. And under President Obama respect for America and its values has massively increased. But then again, as the Romney campaign has made clear, they won't allow their campaign to be governed by "fact checkers."

If we needed reminding, this week made indelibly clear that a guy with no principles except his own ambition, and no vision whatsoever, will allow himself to be led around by the nose by the passionate Neo-Cons who want a restoration of the Bush-Cheney years. Romney's performance should serve as a warning to all Americans: If you liked the Iraq War, you'll love Mitt Romney's foreign policy.

After the Terror Attacks of 2015: A French Activist Foreign Policy Here to Stay?

The shock over the 2015 terrorist attacks in Paris could have been a turning-point in both France's domestic and international policies, and more specifically in its military engagement in the Syrian crisis and the fight against jihadist terrorism. Many have seen a more activist French foreign policy resulting from the November attacks. Yet, deeper trends in French foreign and security policy frame its recent initiatives on the international stage, accompanying President François Hollande's diplomatic activism and France's strategic priorities in the European neighborhoods and at the global level. The newly robust and activist French foreign policy that assumes more security responsibilities and steps up its military and diplomatic engagement comes from a crystallization of deeper trends that had been developing for a few years, at both international and domestic levels.

In this new GMF Policy Paper , authors Dr. Alexandra de Hoop Scheffer, Martin Michelot, and Martin Quencez analyze the shaping and the implementation of France's recent diplomatic and military actions in light of shifts in the strategic environment and blurring lines between domestic and foreign policies. France's post-November 13th focus on the fight against terrorism will increase its reliance on US military leadership and capabilities in the MENA region, and on NATO's and European partners' resolve to deter Russia in the East. The expectations that France has of its Allies in supporting this agenda may create further tensions at the heart of NATO, as we approach the Warsaw summit. The challenges faced by French "leadership from the front" mirrors those faced by U.S. "leadership from behind": European countries are neither willing to follow France's military initiatives, nor able to share the leadership on security issues. Despite military overstretch at home and abroad, France has become the United States' most reliable European partner for power projection operations, but also competes directly with the United States, by deploying a hyper-pragmatic economic diplomacy with the Gulf States, Egypt, and Iran. Finally, the French domestic context has changed since the 2015 terrorist attacks, blurring the lines between traditional political postures and between domestic and foreign policy, making Hollande fully accountable for his foreign policy decisions, and allowing opposition leaders to criticize and question the efficiency of his military engagements and his exercise of diplomacy.

Subject:	My position on the Iran deal

NANCY ROTERING

Democrat for Congress

Friends,

Within the next few weeks, Congress will be voting on the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (the Iran Deal). As a Jewish American running for United States Congress, I have been asked my position on the Iran Deal. It is important to remember the goal of this global agreement – to stop Iran from developing a nuclear weapon. While I have serious concerns about the proposed deal, rejecting the deal without providing a realistic or credible alternative is an irresponsible disservice to all who are concerned about the security of the United States, Israel and the world.

My opponents both have stated their rejection of the deal. Before the ink was dry, Bob Dold (R) came out against the deal and called upon Brad Schneider (D) to join him in his opposition, which Brad did. Unfortunately, neither Bob nor Brad offers a viable alternative to the proposed deal because there is none.

Careful analysis and discussion with diverse opinion leaders here at home and in Israel have led me to the conclusion that we have no alternative but to accept this imperfect deal.

Rejecting this deal would not return the negotiating nations to the table. It would not maintain the current sanctions. Instead, it would eliminate any opportunity to roll back or effectively monitor Iran's nuclear capabilities. Rejecting this deal would isolate the US and deliver a blow to American credibility around the world, both with its negotiating partners, as well as with its adversaries. Rejecting this deal would also pave the way for the removal of international sanctions and result in an Iran closer to, not farther from, gaining access to a nuclear weapon.

It is easy to imagine terms that we all would have preferred to be included in the deal. However, redrafting this globally negotiated deal is not an option and without this deal, we will be facing an uncontained, unmonitored Iran.

While the US should make it absolutely clear that all options will remain on the table, this is the time to work with our allies to ensure strict Iranian adherence to its obligations, to solidify our strong defense partnership with Israel, and to work together to enhance the security of the Middle East.

Sincerely,

Nancy

Puerto Rico on the Brink: Energy, Economy, and Security

Puerto Rico, America's largest Caribbean territory, has long been an important U.S. geopolitical outpost and now finds itself on the verge of catastrophe under the weight of massive debt and a costly, inefficient energy supply. The impacts have triggered a large-scale resettlement to the U.S. mainland where gridlock has turned the Island's future into a political hot potato rather than an issue of long-term strategic importance for U.S. national security.

As Congress recommits itself to a resolution, understanding the issues plaguing Puerto Rico through the lens of energy security and risk management offers opportunities to reverse the current trends, gain political support and address the future of 3.3 million U.S. citizens on the island.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Roosevelt Island to Shine Under the Hillary Clinton Spotlight // NYT // Joshua Jamerson – June 12, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's decision to use Roosevelt Island, the two-mile sliver of land mashed between Queens and Manhattan, as the backdrop Saturday for her first major stump speech sent a small but noticeable ripple through the island's previously scheduled weekend plans.

For example, the Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park, where Mrs. Clinton will speak, rescheduled a children's event that had been set to take place there to accommodate the Clinton team.

"We made the date available by moving one event," said Sally Minard, president of the park, adding that the Clinton campaign did not request the rescheduling of the children's event. "Obviously, you can't do anything in New York City without making someone unhappy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton's speech also happens to land on the same weekend as Roosevelt Island Day, an annual block party-type event intended to celebrate the island and its residents.

"They scheduled it when they scheduled it, it happens to be the same day as Roosevelt Island Day, we've done this for 18 years, and it is what it is," said Sherie Helstien, vice president of the Roosevelt Island Residents Association.

Ms. Helstien was recently quoted in The New York Post as saying the Clinton event would be "horrendous logistically" for the community, which has one subway stop, the famed Roosevelt Island Tramway, and one road for vehicular traffic for people to come onto and leave the island.

She suggested a large number of vehicles could be cause for concern.

"We're going to do what we do and she's going to do what she does, and we'll see what happens," Ms. Helstien said.

Janet Falk, a member of the residents association, said she couldn't predict if attendance would take a hit at the Roosevelt Island celebration because of the Clinton rally. "Residents of Roosevelt Island and of New York will vote with their feet," she said.

Still, several community leaders, including Ms. Helstien, say the events have about a mile of distance between them, and there should be enough room for both Roosevelt Island Day and the Clinton speech, which is expected to draw a fair share of news media.

Jeffrey Escobar, the residents association president, said Mrs. Clinton's event should be good for the island's reputation to fellow New Yorkers and to tourists.

"If you talk to some people around the city, they might only know Roosevelt Island for the Tramway," Mr. Escobar said. "Any exposure for us is always good."

With regard to transportation, the F train will not see a change in service, a Metropolitan Transportation Authority spokesman said.

But the Tramway, which usually runs every 15 minutes during off-peak hours, will run about every seven minutes on this particular Saturday. It can carry up to 110 people per ride.

Samir Dagher, 41, moved to Roosevelt Island in September. Though he said the expected influx of people on the island probably won't affect him, he said he did not understand why Mrs. Clinton's campaign picked the small island to officially kick off her candidacy.

"Certainly, it'd be nice to do it in a place that doesn't have only one road in," Mr. Dagher said, comparing the access with "a big farm in Iowa."

While GOP fixates on foreign policy, Hillary Clinton goes domestic // WaPo // Anne Gearan & Dan Balz – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Republican presidential hopefuls warn of Iranian duplicity and Russian aggression and accuse President Obama of allowing the rise of Islamic State militants, the most experienced foreign-policy hand in the 2016 race says almost nothing about events beyond U.S. shores.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, who served four years as secretary of state and was known as a national security hawk in the Senate before that, is preparing for a campaign in which economic and kitchen-table issues are at the forefront.

The disconnect says much about the nature of the crowded Republican primary contest, in which conservative-leaning voters hold sway, and the different landscape that Clinton is navigating as she makes her second run for the Democratic nomination.

Republican primary voters tend to care about foreign policy at higher rates anyway, but this year overseas issues present opportunities for candidates to distinguish themselves from one another and paint Obama as weak.

Obama is as much or more of a foil for Republicans at this stage of the race, and the improving economy may leave less room to attack the president on domestic issues.

Clinton — who headed the State Department during Obama's first term — is also a frequent target for Republican foreign-policy criticism, but she is confining her own critiques of GOP policies to domestic issues such as voting rights.

[Will Hillary Clinton's State Department experience be a liability?]

In her calculation, foreign policy will not be a central question during a primary contest against far-lesser-known Democratic rivals, and far less important than in past elections when it comes to the general election.

There is not a word about foreign policy in a memo that Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook sent to key supporters this week. The memo is a primer for a speech Clinton will deliver Saturday to lay out a campaign agenda focused squarely on those in, or aspiring to, the American middle class. A preview video released by the campaign Friday made only a brief reference to her time as secretary of state, and foreign policy will probably get only a few lines in her speech.

"She will outline her vision for America's future and her roadmap to help everyday American families get ahead and stay ahead," Mook wrote.

Since entering the race on April 12, Clinton has addressed social and economic issues such as same-sex marriage, the crush of college debt and paid family leave. She has called for overhauls of the nation's immigration, criminal justice and voting systems.

Her only public remarks about foreign policy have come in response to news media questions about her tenure as secretary of state — she said she's proud of it — and the changing nature of the conflict in Iraq.

She also has brusquely said she will let voters decide what they think about the deaths of four Americans in Benghazi, Libya, while she was the country's top diplomat. She said she wants the State Department to release her e-mail correspondence about the Libyan terrorist attacks as quickly as possible.

Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta said he's not positive Clinton will do an overseas swing ahead of the first primary contests early next year.

"I'm not sure she needs to," Podesta said in an interview. "She doesn't need to go to England to prove she knows the difference between the queen and the prime minister."

Meanwhile former Florida governor Jeb Bush is in Europe this week on a tour intended to look presidential. He arrived in Germany mere hours after Obama had left the annual summit of the Group of Seven wealthy nations, and finishes the visit Friday in Estonia.

Fellow Republican hopefuls Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin have taken similar trips of late, all seeking a measure of commander-in-chief gravitas and a means to attack the sitting Democratic president. Walker arrives in Canada for a six-day trip on Friday.

The passport parade to Europe, Israel and other strategic places is sure to continue as Republicans vie for the 2016 nomination.

At candidate forums in Iowa and New Hampshire and South Carolina and in television interviews, the GOP prospects focus on foreign crises such as the advance of the Islamic State terrorist group as threats to American security and leadership.

This is the first election cycle since 2000 in which foreign wars or the threat of terrorism have not been dominant issues for Democrats. Although the next president is likely to inherit problems including the ongoing Syrian civil war and the precarious future of the U.S.-backed government in Iraq, Clinton's Democratic challengers aren't saying much more about foreign policy than she is.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is running as an economic populist to Clinton's left. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley is also trying to appeal to far-left ambivalence about Clinton, mostly on social and economic issues.

"He has talked about how he voted against the first Gulf War back in '91, and he led opposition to the Iraq war," Sanders spokesman Michael Briggs said. "But his basic concern is the 40-year decline of the American middle class."

Former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee has been the toughest on Clinton over her 2003 Senate vote in favor of the Iraq war. Chafee said Clinton "didn't do her homework" ahead of that vote, which would become one of the main reasons she lost the 2008 nomination to Obama.

Former Virginia senator Jim Webb, a former Navy secretary, speaks frequently about American leadership and takes some indirect shots at Clinton. Webb has said he is considering a candidacy but has not made it official.

At least one of the six planned Democratic debates is likely to focus on foreign policy, which could give long shots like Chafee a chance to show up Clinton. But Clinton does not appear concerned either about that risk or about a Republican focus on foreign policy that Democratic strategists contend is less about public opinion and more about opportunism.

When former Texas governor Rick Perry announced his candidacy last week, he put it this way, using a common acronym for Islamic State: "The world has descended into a chaos of this president's own making, while his White House loyalists construct an alternative universe where ISIS is contained."

On Saturday in Boone, Iowa, at a gathering hosted by Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa), one after another of the candidates talked about threats overseas.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) said he would be prepared to send U.S. troops back into Iraq to fight Islamic State forces and said the lack of leadership has been crippling to this country.

“I’m weary of being walked over,” he said. “I’m weary of being disrespected as a nation. I’m weary of [Russian President Vladimir] Putin. I’m weary of China taking advantage of us. I’m weary of terrorists growing in strength. . . . I’m tired of leading from behind. I want to lead from the front. I want America to come back.”

Walker described Islamic State as a virus. “I, on behalf of your children and mine, would rather take the fight to them instead of waiting until they bring the fight to us,” he said. “We need to lead from the front again in America.”

Businesswoman Carly Fiorina challenged the administration for trying to negotiate a deal with Iran to contain its nuclear ambitions. On her first day in office, she said, she would send a message to the supreme leader of Iran, warning that unless the Iranians opened up all their nuclear facilities, the United States would enact “the most punishing economic sanctions” yet.

Clinton advisers are braced for constant attacks on Obama’s record as a way to get to Clinton but see the GOP candidates as hamstrung when it comes to alternative policies, particularly the issue of sending in ground troops to try to destroy Islamic State. They believe Clinton’s experience in foreign policy will outweigh the Republican criticisms and are confident that many voters see her as prepared to take strong action herself as president.

They say they are content for Republicans to try to make the general election about foreign policy, arguing that she would be able to counter their criticisms with relative ease. They believe that those who care most about making the election about foreign policy are largely Republicans who vote in the primaries and caucuses.

One Clinton adviser literally broke into laughter when asked whether the team anticipated that foreign policy would be the central issue of the campaign.

“If it were a foreign policy election, we would feel great about our chances,” the adviser said. “But we don’t see it as a foreign policy election.”

Hillary Clinton portrayed as ‘a fighter’ in new campaign video // WaPo // Jose DelReal – June 12, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign on Friday released a video touting the Democratic candidate's four decades in public service, part of an effort to emphasize her personal biography ahead of her much-anticipated campaign launch rally Saturday.

"Everyone deserves a chance to live up to his or her god given potential," Clinton says in the video. "That's the dream we share. That's the fight we must wage."

As the Clinton campaign readies for its formal launch on Roosevelt Island in New York City Saturday, she and her team are turning their attention to communicating a strong rationale for her candidacy. The video paints Clinton as a "fighter" -- the name of the video -- whose presidential ambitions are an extension of her lifelong commitment to public service. The theme is perhaps also an attempt to re-frame Clinton's divisive public persona into a strength, meant to evoke loyalty among her base.

The five-minute video features pictures and clips from Clinton's days at a student to her tenure as secretary of state, underscoring her campaign's push to emphasize her biography in a more personal way than she did in the 2008 election. Key moments from Clinton's career are highlighted throughout the video, including her famous 1995 speech on women's rights in Beijing, her time in the Senate, and even her tumultuous -- and failed -- attempt to reform health care during former president Bill Clinton's administration.

"It is a violation of human rights when babies are denied food or drowned or suffocated simply because they are born girls," Clinton is shown saying in a video excerpt from her Beijing speech. "Human rights are women's rights and women's rights are human rights once and for all."

Wonk Warrior // Politico // Glenn Thrush – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton hasn't always been a profile in political courage, but she's had her moments. One of them came in late December 2006, a month before Clinton announced her first run for the presidency, as she huddled with her team to discuss policy proposals to differentiate her from two rivals flanking her on the left, Barack Obama and John Edwards.

The conversation, which included former Clinton White House aides like Gene Sperling and Neera Tanden, who still have the candidate's ear today, bogged down on the biggest, nastiest policy fight of her life, health care. Several of Clinton's top advisers, the '90s debacle fresh in everyone's mind, counseled her to avoid proposing an individual mandate, the politically unpopular requirement that the uninsured buy insurance or face penalties.

When it came to the widely unpopular individual mandate, however, she was adamant about plowing ahead, according to a former aide who related the story.

"If I run for president, I'm going to run on universal health care," Clinton told the group—and authorized attacks on her Democratic opponent Obama for opposing a mandate (he would eventually embrace it as president, much to Clinton's amusement).

"What's the point of running if I'm not going to run on universal health care?" she asked her team.

Eight years later, on the eve of Clinton's formal campaign kickoff in New York this weekend, the "what's the point of running?" question looms over the presumptive Democratic front-runner and her campaign. Over the past few months, even some of Clinton's most fervent and loyal supporters have fretted to me, over and over, that she hasn't yet articulated a compelling rationale for her second race for the White House beyond the sense that it's finally her turn and her political view that she's facing a relatively weak Republican field.

Clinton is no Teddy Kennedy, who suffered the most infamous case of lockjaw in political history when asked why he wanted to be president during the 1980 campaign; Her problem is that she's far more interested in the how than the why of the presidency, and views her greatest assets as a willingness to engage all participants in a debate and a workmanlike capacity to hammer out policy solutions.

Clinton's big speech will be a rare opportunity to change that narrative. It will be held at New York's Roosevelt Island—a none-to-subtle signal that she's aligning herself with FDR, the boldest of Democratic presidents and the one who established the deepest personal connection with voters—something Clinton has struggled to do throughout her three-decade career. And she'll do so with a broad progressive agenda, her advisers told me, studded with policy proposals to be unveiled in greater depth in a series of speeches this summer, starting with an ambitious plan to cut student debt and lower tuition and a program to coax corporations into paying their workers more. Clinton's staff believes this is where the campaign will be won or lost—it will signal to voters, and to ideologically driven Obama donors, that she's every bit as committed to their cause as Elizabeth Warren or Bernie Sanders—or the Hillary Clinton of 1993 for that matter.

This isn't some pro forma exercise for Clinton, who started her professional career working on child welfare programs and sits, poolside, with briefing books when she's on vacation. Policy is what Hillary Clinton lives for, and her team is committed to portray her as a wonk warrior, which has the added virtue of being true. In 2008, the candidate emphasized her inevitability and her toughness (she was obsessed with the idea that male voters would view a woman as a weak potential commander-in-chief), but for 2016, she's building her strategy around a series of domestic policy rollouts.

How she's doing this is equally telling: Advisers told me it was an elaborate, even West Wing-style policy process, with concentric circles of advisers and pollsters who are cooking up a comprehensive economic policy, some of which will be for public consumption, some of which will be employed if she's elected. Over the past year, Clinton has quietly met with a rotating—and sharp-elbowed—cast of Democratic economic experts, pollsters, staffers and advocates to craft a just-so economic program to attack wage stagnation and economic inequality. The very explicit goal has been political: to invent a program for Clinton that captures the popular imagination—and, to no small extent, redefines a candidate with a trustworthiness problem.

"We're talking about three- and four-hour meetings, briefing papers, weeks of back-and-forth," says Clinton's communications director Jennifer Palmieri, who says the candidate will unveil pieces of her agenda, one by one, in a series of events starting in July and stretching to the fall. "This is the foundational work of the election. She's a wonk. This is stuff she loves to do."

What's emerging—and her staff maintains she's made no big decisions on the stickiest subjects, such as whether to propose tax increases and Wall Street regulation—are classic Clinton thread-the-needle proposals, albeit with a slightly sharper needle, pointing unmistakably to the left.

Nobel Laureate Joseph Stiglitz had a one-on-one meeting with Clinton last December to discuss his aggressive progressive agenda, pushing for deep tax cuts against the wealthy and pay cuts for CEOs. She already knew the subject inside out, he told me, and probed him for details on how some of his proposals could be implemented. Like most of the economists and advocates she's met with recently, Stiglitz left satisfied he'd gotten a fair hearing, but with no concrete commitment.

"I would be surprised at this point that she would want to make it clear where she is going on the specifics, so I wouldn't expect to hear that from her anytime soon," said Stiglitz, who worked on Bill Clinton's economic team—then went on to become one of the country's most influential champions of economic equality. "My sense was that she was very responsive to the overall agenda. … It's important for her to get elected, but we want to make sure that she understands that we have to deal with the failure of the system overall, and not just make small changes."

The goal, according to a dozen people close to the process who spoke to POLITICO, is to find the "sweet spot"—bold solutions that aren't too bold. She has tasked her small in-house policy team led by former State Department aide Jake Sullivan with a pragmatic mission: Attack the biggest problems—higher education debt, a tax system that encourages short-term gain over long-tern investments, out-of-control CEO pay, crumbling infrastructure, the non-job-security "gig" economy, women's pay equity—in a way that satisfies a restive left wing of the party. But do it without needlessly alienating general election voters, or potential donors.

"She wants to do just enough," is how one New York-based Clinton donor who speaks to both Clintons regularly put it.

As important—and complex—as the health care debate was seven years ago when Clinton last ran for president, it's dwarfed today by the sheer magnitude of the structural problems in the American economy, a sapping of dynamism and middle-income purchasing power that has given consumers (and voters) a permanent sense of the blahs, even as big banks and corporations book record profits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two years ago, Tanden, now the head of the Clinton-friendly Center for American Progress—who is still in frequent contact with Clinton and CAP founder John Podesta who is the campaign's chairman—embarked on an ambitious effort to create a comprehensive Democratic blueprint for tacking these problems. The effort didn't have Clinton's official sanction, but she was kept in the loop and its mission statement fits Clinton's own private assessment of the problem. Middle-income wage stagnation and growth that benefits only the wealthiest "is an economic problem that threatens to become a problem for [the] political system—and for the idea of democracy itself," the report found.

The report, co-authored by Larry Summers, the former treasury secretary for Clinton's husband who later emerged as a contentious leader of Obama's initial economic team in the White House and whose mere presence in Clinton's camp makes Warren and other liberals nervous, but he too was an enthusiastic backer of the campaign's pragmatic progressive approach. Many of the positions that will form the core of Clinton's platform are in it, I'm told—from phased-in minimum wage hikes pegged to local market conditions to the elimination of "carried interest" tax breaks for hedge funds to the extension of the Earned Income Tax Credit to encompass a greater number of working-class Americans.

But progressives, and many in Clinton's camp, don't merely want a carefully wrought, rational program—they crave a crusade against inequality that will unify the party and rebrand a high-odometer candidate. And they wonder if she can ever really be the apostle the party faithful crave.

Clinton can match Sanders on the finer points of policy (her college affordability plan is geared, in part, to outflank him on the left) but she's too much of an establishment figure—and maybe too rich—to authentically approximate his blue tea party populist rage. "People are just profoundly disgusted with an economy in which the rich and the corporations are doing fundamentally well and they are struggling," Sanders told me, when I asked what the crowds have been telling him at recent, well-attended campaign events.

"People don't want this system to continue, period," added Sanders who said he plans to unveil a comprehensive tax plan in the not-too-distant future. "They want the right to pay their fair share of taxes. People do want the Wall Street banks broken up… I don't want to talk about any other candidates but I've been talking about this my entire career."

Every campaign puts out some kind of big economic plan—almost all of them are pieced together, Frankenstein-like compendiums of previous programs and poll-tested formulations geared at wooing a particular voter group, and most of course have little chance of passing. Some, like Steve Forbes' "flat tax" plan in 1996, are designed to provoke a national argument, and only the rarest of them all—like Ronald Reagan's 1980 tax-cut crusade—represent the core of a campaign's actual thinking or the rebranding of a movement. A lot of Democrats think the party's 2016 platform needs to fit into that last category if Clinton is to inspire her base and reach out to disaffected working-class whites.

"I think there's an effort to create post-Obama economic agenda," says Felicia Wong, CEO of the Roosevelt Institute, a progressive think tank—and one of the dozens of outside economic advisers Clinton and her small policy staff have consulted in recent weeks. "We are talking eight years after the financial crisis—we have had sluggish growth for the majority of Americans. These are structural problems, and I have to believe … Mrs. Clinton will recognize this."

Clinton, in a speech last month, channeled liberal economists like Thomas Picketty and Stiglitz—not to mention Elizabeth Warren, Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, who are waging long-shot campaigns against Clinton from the left. "Where is it all going?" asked Clinton, referring to the sputtering recovery from the Great Recession. "Economists have documented how the share of income and wealth going to those at the very top, not just the top 1 percent but the top 0.1 percent, the 0.01 percent of the population, has risen sharply."

Still her first big progressive test so far in this campaign ended in an incomplete: She has flatly refused to take a side in the fight over the controversial Trans-Pacific Partnership, an agreement she touted as Obama's secretary of state, and the raging intraparty debate over whether to fast track the agreement.

The dodge confirmed longheld suspicions about Clinton on the left. Warren—who has opted for a gadfly role rather than challenging Clinton in the primary—recently told a TV interviewer, "It's up to others to say whether they stand there as well, or if they stand in some different place," a clear allusion to Clinton. In an email to supporters in late April, O'Malley, once a Clinton ally and now her sharpest critic, tweaked Clinton for not making a "hard choice" on the pact—a play on Clinton's recent memoir Hard Choices. Echoing Warren, he added that "American workers... deserve to know where their leaders stand."

Clinton's aides are confident she can weather the storm, and quietly applauded President Obama's recent declaration that Warren "was a politician like everybody else."

But Warren's ascendance is clearly a sore point with the candidate herself. Nothing annoys Clinton quite so much as hearing someone giving the upstart Massachusetts senator credit for a policy stance Clinton herself espoused years earlier.

Recently, when an adviser mentioned Warren was receiving plaudits for a mortgage relief proposal, an exasperated Clinton asked a staffer to "dig up my 2007 [housing] plan"—and distribute it to reporters.

For the most part, however, Clinton has courted, not confronted, the left. Her policy shop has already laid out a series of proposals geared toward energizing the party's base (and denying the progressive high ground to Sangers and O'Malley), mostly by doubling down on many of the measures already adopted by the Obama administration: Last week, for example, she unveiled a plan for automatic voting registration and blasted states, like Ohio, which have restricted ballot access. She also came out early in favor of same-sex marriage and LGBT rights—renouncing her husband's Defense of Marriage Act, and vowed to expand Obama's immigration reform executive order if she inherits a recalcitrant GOP Congress.

She has also surrounded herself with leading progressive theorists and researchers. Arguably, the most influential thinker Clinton's orbit these days is Harvard professor and political scientist Robert Putnam, whose recent work on the lack of social mobility in underprivileged communities has captured her imagination and influenced her approach to policy prescriptions.

Clinton—who devoured his most recent book Our Kids: The American Dream in Crisis, met with Putnam for several hours in May and peppered him with questions about his research, which have centered on the structure of families and the role of a parents' educational attainment in determining the economic mobility of their children. She has also rekindled a relationship with Harvard economist Lawrence Katz, who was the chief economist at her husband's labor department and has also studied the link between economic opportunity and mobility. Another economist Clinton is close to: CAP's Heather Boushey, who has studied the impact of economic inequality and families.

But tougher issues lie just ahead—especially for a candidate who's going to run on her wonk credentials. Stiglitz, with the support of Warren and New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, put out his own report on how to tackle inequality. It covered much of the same territory as the CAP report—but featured more radical solutions. Clinton's team took it seriously, and have grilled Stiglitz and his team repeatedly on the proposals. One advocate told me they have been especially intrigued by his criticism of intellectual property rights protections in international trade agreements, which Stiglitz believes constrain innovation and investment.

But the team is less enamored with provocative Stiglitz proposals like breaking up big banks, as Sanders proposed, or jacking up corporate tax rates on companies that pay their executives too much. The emphasis, people close to the process say, is on a slightly less nasty-sounding campaign for "corporate responsibility," using leverage in the tax code to level the playing field to bend Wall Street toward economic justice.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton and her small team are gaming out dozens of ideas in a series of conference calls and memos, but a few a have emerged as favorites, including a proposal floated by Maryland Democratic Rep. Chris Van Hollen to strip tax deductions from companies who don't provide reasonable raises for workers. Clinton's team is also looking into various permutations of a tax on stock trades, as a way to incentivize longer-term capital investment over quick-turn profit taking in the market and buy-backs.

It's a complex undertaking, and Clinton's policy chief Jake Sullivan has organized the effort to resemble a through-appropriate-channels paper trail that resembles the process Clinton used as first lady and in her Senate office.

There has been the usual jockeying for position in Clinton's circle, a practice campaign chairman John Podesta recently told a friend was equivalent to the "junior high school lunchroom stuff." But so far, it's been a pretty no-drama operation, especially compared with the relative free-for-all of the 2008 campaign.

The policy process Clinton had developed is modeled on the way her husband and his White House staff ran the National Economic Council, which in turn, had been borrowed from the process used by the National Security Council. It's no accident that Sullivan, the hyper-organized aide tasked with running the policy operation in Brooklyn, was often Clinton's proxy at Situation Room meetings when he was at the State Department.

Sullivan may be a fast study but he is relatively inexperienced in domestic policy, so he's being assisted by two trusted outsiders who serve as standby advisers for the staff and Clinton herself—CAP's Tanden and Gene Sperling, who recently left the Obama administration where he served as head of the NEC.

An occasional adviser is Larry Summers, but his role has largely been confined to offering his expertise to staffers who requiring on-the-fly macro economics seminars, according to people familiar with the situation.

Summers, whose bid to become Fed chairman was derailed by Warren, is anathema to the left who sees him as a protector of the Wall Street status quo—but Clinton has pointedly told critics that she won't allow outside opinions to limit the people she talks to. Nonetheless, Summers, back at Harvard, is not considered particularly influential at the moment, even though both Clintons respect his counsel.

"Larry is trying to elbow his way in," is how one senior Democrat described the situation.

If there's a tug-of-war inside Clinton's campaign, it's over just how far she can afford to go. Clinton, as she did in 2008, is often the one who pumps the brakes; people close to her say she often asks aides to game out the backlash against any given proposal, and sends their memos back with a raft of questions and information requests.

But many on Clinton's team believe she has wide latitude for action, especially when it comes for taxing the super-rich in new and creative ways, citing public and private poll data; indeed, chief pollster Joel Benenson's last presidential campaign, Obama's victorious 2012 reelection, was rooted in a pledge to raise high-end taxes, and he's told his new colleagues that the environment is even more favorable now.

Yet there are obvious political reasons for Clinton not to rush out a detailed set of proposals that might stoke rather than settle intraparty tensions, at least on such lightning-rod subjects as inequality-busting tax policy or cracking down on over-the-top CEO pay.

She also wants to quantify the threat posed by the left wing of the party—to see how much enthusiasm Sanders and O'Malley generate. As importantly, she needs to see how the Republican field shakes out—and which issues emerge from the GOP debates, which begin in late summer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet, by the same token, many liberal Democrats, including Warren and de Blasio—and potential big-money donors to Clinton-allied super PACs—are also adopting a wait-and-see approach about her.

Earlier this week de Blasio praised Sanders and said he was impressed by Clinton's initial campaigning—but told the city press corps he won't attend her campaign kickoff on Roosevelt Island.

When will de Blasio, campaign manager of Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign in New York, endorse her? When she offers a "larger vision for addressing income inequality," he said.

For Hillary Rodham Clinton, her mother will loom large in campaign // WaPo // David Fahrenthold – June 12, 2015

She was given up by her father at age 8, sent across the country alone on a train with her 3-year-old sister. Later, living with strict grandparents in California, she was confined to her room for a year — leaving only for school — for the offense of trick-or-treating.

Dorothy Rodham, the late mother of Hillary Rodham Clinton, will play a major role in her daughter's formal campaign kickoff speech Saturday in New York City.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton will cast her mother as symbolic of the “everyday Americans” that she wants the power to help, aides say.

But that is under-selling her story. Rodham — who died in 2011 at age 92 — lived an extraordinary life, which began with abandonment and loneliness, moved through the stifling comfort of mid-century suburbia, and ended with her daughter as the most prominent woman in American politics.

Along the way, Rodham gave her daughter things that had been missing from her own childhood: a stable family, a college education.

And one thing that Rodham’s own childhood had been full of: toughness.

“We moved into this new house, new neighborhood, and she would come in crying and screaming about the fact that she’d been set upon by a group of children, mostly her age, and this one girl who was exactly her age, Suzy, across the street,” Rodham recounted on Oprah Winfrey’s TV show in 2004.

This was an often-told story of Clinton’s childhood: Her mother told her to go back out and confront the bully. “She came in one day, and I said, ‘You know, this is just about enough, Hillary. You have to face things and show them you’re not afraid.’ ”

Rodham was born Dorothy Howell in 1919 in Chicago, the daughter of a firefighter. But her parents fought violently, according to press reports, and then divorced. When her father could not care for them, Rodham and her sister were sent to live with his parents in Alhambra, Calif., near Los Angeles.

But her grandparents were dour and strict, and Rodham moved out at age 14. In the grip of the Depression, she worked as a housekeeper while attending high school.

After graduation, Rodham made a last attempt to reconnect with her parents. She went back to Chicago, where her mother and her mother’s new husband had promised to pay for her college education.

But when she got there, they reneged. No college. They asked Rodham instead to work as their housekeeper.

In her 2003 memoir, “Living History,” Clinton wrote: “Once I asked my mother why she went back to Chicago. ‘I’d hoped so hard that my mother would love me that I had to take the chance and find out,’ she told me. ‘When she didn’t, I had nowhere else to go.’ ”

In 1937, Rodham met her future husband when she applied for a job as a secretary at the Columbia Lace Co. Hugh Rodham worked as a curtain salesman there.

They married in 1942 and moved to suburban Park Ridge. Hugh Rodham ran a business, and his wife stayed at home and raised three children: Hillary, the oldest (Dorothy Rodham liked the name because it sounded exotic and unusual), and two younger brothers.

Hugh was a conservative Republican and would often talk about how Americans ought to be self-reliant and the government shouldn’t give handouts. But his wife often debated him at dinner. “Now, wait a minute,” she would say, according to a 2007 profile in The Washington Post. “Sometimes things happen to people that they have no control over.”

Their daughter listened and sometimes sought to play peacemaker — an early exposure to the two warring camps of American politics.

“I think it was part of the balance I created in my own life, it became a balancing of all my different influences and values,” Clinton once told The Post. “A lot was worth admiring in the sense of rugged individualism. But it didn’t explain enough for me about the world, or the world as I would want it to be.”

Rodham encouraged her daughter to go to college, and Clinton eventually chose Wellesley College in Massachusetts. Her daughter was going off into the world much better-armed than Rodham herself had been: older, better educated, headed to a college where she would achieve even more.

“Aside from a few trips away with girlfriends,” she says, “Hillary hadn’t really been away from home. I loved having my kids around, and when she went to Wellesley, well, it was really, really hard to leave her. After we dropped her off, I just crawled in the back seat,” Rodham told The Post later, “and cried for 800 miles.”

Hugh Rodham died in 1993, just after his daughter had moved into the White House as first lady. Dorothy Rodham later moved to New York, after her daughter became a senator from that state, and then to Washington.

Rodham largely avoided the public spotlight. But when her daughter ran for president the first time, in 2008, Rodham appeared at some campaign events. She appeared again at the announcement that her daughter had fallen short of the presidency and was ending her run.

“I ran as a daughter who benefited from opportunities my mother never dreamed of,” Clinton said then. It is a theme she will pick up again on Saturday, as the next campaign formally begins.

Could a skywriter crash Hillary Clinton’s campaign launch? // WaPo // Philip Bump – June 12, 2015

On Saturday, from the southern tip of New York City's Roosevelt Island, Hillary Clinton will wholeheartedly launch her campaign to be president of the United States.

Intentionally or not, Roosevelt Island has the distinct advantage of being small, with limited points of entry, meaning that the risk of disruption from Clinton's opponents should be minimal.

The park will offer beautiful vistas of the city around Clinton, as she speaks. Imagine a raised platform down at the end of these rows of trees, an adoring crowd waving "Hillary 2016" signs over their heads as they cheer.

And then imagine a plane flying by in the clear blue sky overhead, writing the word "BENGHAZI."

New York City is a very good place for aerial advertising. A lot of people in not-a-lot of space. Airplane-based advertising is not uncommon at all. A Geico banner regularly patrols up and down the Hudson River behind a small prop plane. A few weeks ago a plane wrote out "NERO" over a luxurious party on a yacht. (It was supposed to write "ZERO." Oops.)

So why wouldn't some of the more clever people at the RNC or on Rand Paul's team figure out that they should hire an airplane, too? What better way to get some headlines?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are different ways of doing both banners and skywriting, Ted de Reeder of National Sky Ads explained when I spoke with him by phone. His company does the sorts of banners that are composed of a series of tall red letters strung out behind the plane, and the skywriting that is five planes flying in formation. "They do it digitally, like the old dot-matrix printers," he explained, with planes turning the writing on and off, sort of like below.

The white parts are when the planes create smoke, working from right to left.

Of course, the planes aren't fighter jets. They're what de Reeder referred to as "two-sixes," with 650 horsepower. "It sounds like Hell's Angels," he said. (All of the pilots his company uses are American Airlines captains working on their day off.) The letters the planes write are the size of the Empire State Building and stretch for miles.

Now, you may notice a problem above: The skywriting only works on clear days (which Saturday in New York is not expected to be). The planes burn a mix of biodegradable oil ("it's a lot like K-Y,' de Reeder said) and water. "It goes in the exhaust chamber and it comes out as smoke."

Joel (who declined to offer a last name), who works for AirAds, said that using color in the smoke requires a different sort of plane. The plane "burns it off pretty hot, so any coloring burns off, too." The only group equipped to do it effectively, he said, was the French Air Team, which probably wouldn't rent itself out for the Ted Cruz campaign.

Skywriting, he said, is visible for an "eight-to-10-mile radius" -- but the duration for which they can be read varies depending on wind. Wind dissipates the smoke.

Joel's planes also fly printed banners, which they make in-house. Those can only be seen for a few blocks, which would certainly be enough for viewers (and cameras) on Roosevelt Island. But there's a catch: You can't fly a banner there. Since planes dragging banners fly lower (given that the banner needs to be small enough to get aloft but large enough to be able to be read), those planes aren't allowed to fly over the city. They are only allowed to go up the Hudson, over the George Washington Bridge ("Having traffic problems?") and back down the river to New York Harbor. Roosevelt Island, situated in the East River between Queens and Manhattan, isn't accessible.

In other words, it would have required a lot of luck for skywriting to interfere with Clinton tomorrow, based largely on the weather. (It's supposed to bepartly cloudy, but de Reeder said that wasn't good enough.)

For what it's worth, neither of the companies I spoke with indicated that they'd been hired to do so anyway -- though neither seemed to have many concerns about doing so. "I do a lot of controversial stuff," de Reeder told me. "I don't discriminate. 'Vote for Change,' and then the next one up is, 'Impeach Obama.' Whatever."

An if you're thinking that this article might inspire someone to get a plane up tomorrow: Nope. It takes a few weeks to bring a project together. But there is more than enough time to contact Joel or de Reeder for all of your "Impeach Clinton" needs.

Bill Clinton Is Attending Hillary Clinton's Campaign-Policy Meetings // WSJ // Erica Orden – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton‘s campaign on Friday gave some clues to how it would use one of its biggest potential assets: former President Bill Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We're going to be leaning on him for fundraising. We're going to be leaning on him for retail campaigning," Mrs. Clinton's communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, said at a panel discussion in Manhattan. "We will lean on him all the time for strategic advice."

Mr. Clinton has already been attending some of Mrs. Clinton's policy meetings, according to Ms. Palmieri, who said such meetings are regularly scheduled for between three and four hours.

"He doesn't come to every meeting that we have, but he does join his wife often in our discussions, and it's always fascinating.... because it's always something no one else said," Ms. Palmieri said.

Ms. Palmieri waved off the notion that Mr. Clinton has been kept out of the campaign limelight, saying, "I don't think he's in the background now. He's not a background kind of guy."

Mr. Clinton has given a number of recent interviews, most of them focused on questions surrounding donations by foreign governments to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation. But until now he hasn't hit the campaign trail with his wife.

On Saturday, however, at Mrs. Clinton's rally on New York City's Roosevelt Island, Mr. Clinton will make his first public campaign appearance, along with the couple's daughter, Chelsea. They aren't scheduled to have speaking roles, however.

In the final moments of Friday's panel, Mr. Clinton received another dose of attention, when Mrs. Clinton's campaign manager, Robby Mook, was asked to perform his impersonation of the former president.

"I may lose my job over this," Mr. Mook said, before complying with the request. "I'm so glad to be here today," Mr. Mook said in a drawl, while displaying Mr. Clinton's signature thumb-over-fist hand gesture. "Great program."

Bill Clinton on donor flap: 'No one has ever asked me for anything' // Politico // Nick Gass – June 12, 2015

Bill Clinton rejected the idea that donors to his family's foundation received special treatment while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state, suggesting that any allegations that have arisen over the last few months are purely political in nature.

"Nobody even suggested it or thought about it or talked about it until the political season began, and somebody said, 'Well, what about this?'," Clinton said during an interview taped this week in Denver during a Clinton Global Initiative event.

No one has ever asked him for anything, Clinton said, adding that he does not know if those companies were seeking favor from his wife's position as secretary of state. Political partisans and investigative journalists have not found anything particularly odious, apart from what "Clinton Cash" author Peter Schweizer deemed as a "smoking gun" in the pattern of behavior.

"I don't know. You never know what people's motives are, but in this case, I'm pretty sure that everybody that gave to Haiti in the aftermath of the earthquake saw what they saw on television, were horrified and wanted to make a difference," he said, adding that he did not "think Hillary would know either."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For example, Clinton said, the United States has always had to lobby for American-made airplanes, noting that Boeing had worked with the State Department while also donating to the foundation's relief efforts following the 2010 Haiti earthquake.

"She was pretty busy those years, and I don't — I never saw her study a list of my contributors," he went on to say. "No one has ever asked me for anything or any of that."

The interview is set to air in full this Sunday on CNN's inaugural episode of "State of the Union with Jake Tapper."

Kickoff rally logistical risks // Politico // Daniel Lippman – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton's long-awaited and once delayed kickoff rally on Saturday is being billed as poignant and celebratory re-introduction of the dynastic political figure, but it holds no shortage of potential logistical headaches and things that could just go plain wrong.

The setting is a memorial park at the southern tip of Roosevelt Island, Four Freedoms Park, which channels the values Franklin D. Roosevelt outlined in his 1941 State of the Union address — freedom of speech, religion, freedom from want and freedom from fear.

The park is full of symbolism, but it's not all that convenient to get to.

"We've got one skinny street running down the length of the island … [and] we have no idea how the Clinton campaign is coming here, either a caravan of Escalades or helicopter or what," said Matthew Katz, the former president of the Roosevelt Island Residents Association.

Since parking on the island is very limited, most people are expected to get to the island either on NYC's Subway's F Train or the tram from Manhattan's 59th Street, which will be running tomorrow on weekday schedules.

"How people will get on and off the island is a question that I'm not prepared to answer," said Katz. "I don't know how they'll do that, especially given that the northern part of the island where we live will be rather congested with tons of people out on the street celebrating us."

Then there's the weather.

Clinton's campaign kickoff rally has doors open at 9:30 am with Clinton expected to speak late morning. According to an email to attendees, "there will be airport style security" and prohibited items include umbrellas.

There's a forecast of scattered thunderstorms in the afternoon with a 40 percent chance of rain, according to Weather.com. As long as the event proceeds on time, never a sure bet in political rallies, Clinton's rally could dodge the storms, although the forecast says it'll be cloudy in the morning, not ideal for all the images coming out of the event.

And Clinton has already caught some bad headlines for bumping a planned event for kids in the park called "Imagination Playground" to play with blue "oversized, architectural blocks."

While that event was postponed, residents are moving forward with the other activities associated with the 18th annual Roosevelt Island Day.

Even though he's a Hillary supporter and said he looked forward to knocking on doors for her in Pennsylvania, Katz said the campaign was "tone deaf" to have their rally on the same day as Roosevelt Island Day.

"[It's] the one day that we celebrate ourselves, [and] they are coming here and as far as we know, are going to be at the southern tip of the island and not mix with us," he said. "We will be out in the street planting flowers, clearing up the debris from the winter, giving kids pony rides, hotdogs" and holding a blood drive.

Still, residents say they're excited and honored that Clinton chose their island to hold her inaugural rally in their often-forgotten part of New York and hope it gets their island, situated in the East River between Manhattan and Queens, a burst of positive publicity.

Katz's wife, Sherie Helstein, currently the vice president of the association, said "it's a good thing for us. It's putting us in the news. Roosevelt Island is being recognized as a place."

"A lot of people still don't know where we are or that we exist," she said, adding that residents often feel they don't have much say in governing themselves given that the 147-acre island is formally governed by a public benefit corporation run by the state.

Current Residents Association president Jeffrey Escobar said in a statement that "the coming of the Campaign to the South of the Island will be a great opportunity to introduce both Secretary Clinton and those visiting the heart of the Island to our great community."

Campaign manager Robby Mook contrasts Hillary Clinton, Obama on immigration // Politico // Annie Karni – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign manager Robby Mook for the first time on Friday positioned her stance on immigration directly in relation to President Barack Obama, saying she "is advocating for going even further than President Obama on immigration, to stop deporting the parents of these DREAMers who are contributing to our economy, and are valuable members of our society."

Clinton has advocated expanding Obama's executive actions to allow millions or more undocumented immigrants to obtain legal protection and work permits. But campaign officials in the past have used the issue to draw a distinction with the Republican field, not the president.

"Specifically in the policy that she was proposing, she wanted to make it easier for families to appeal some of these deportation decisions, parents of DREAMers who might be facing deportation," Mook explained of the policy differences between Obama and the former Secretary of State.

In a panel discussion hosted by POLITICO Playbook Friday night, Mook was joined by communications director Jennifer Palmieri at New York University in Manhattan, in advance of Clinton's much-anticipated kickoff rally Saturday morning on Roosevelt Island. The speech is expected to be light on policy details, but beginning this summer, Palmieri said, Clinton will begin rolling out one policy proposal each week.

The roll of former President Bill Clinton, they said, will be visible, even though he does not have a speaking roll at the kickoff event and so far has not appeared with Clinton on the trail. "We're going to be leaning on him for fundraising," Palmieri said, calling him a huge asset to the campaign. "We're going to be leaning on him for retail campaigning."

The top campaign officials were diplomatic when asked about New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, who served as Clinton's campaign manager in her 2000 Senate race but who so far has refused to endorse her and has declined to attend her kickoff.

While de Blasio's connection to Clinton is well known, Mook revealed he also has a personal bond with the mayor. "Bill de Blasio is a very good friend," Mook said. "I remember bringing up a whole caravan of cars to help volunteer on his Public Advocate race."

But he seemed to gently push back against de Blasio's attempts to build for himself a national profile as a progressive leader by refusing to back Clinton. "He has got a lot going on running New York City," Mook said. "He's busy with that. He's been a strong advocate on a lot of issues, that's great. We all have the same goal here and that is to get this deck unstacked against the middle class."

Mook also downplayed the influence of Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren on moving Clinton to the left. "There have been a lot of folks out there weighing in," he said. "She's one of many voices."

Palmieri also said the campaign was open to an appearance by Clinton on "Saturday Night Live," where she is mocked as maniacally power-hungry and unrelatable by comedian Kate McKinnon. Clinton resisted such a move in 2008.

"The idea has merit," Palmieri said, admitting the entire team found the Clinton impersonation hilarious. "SNL has been a great platform for her, it's been a great platform for President Obama."

Progressives lash out at Clinton on trade // Politico // Jonathan Topaz and Ben Schreckinger – June 12, 2015

Liberals have a message for Hillary Clinton in the wake of Friday's House vote on trade: Refusing to take a stand is worse than standing against us.

Anti-trade Democrats, including influential activists in early primary states, say that Clinton's vague comments on the campaign trail about fast-track authority for the Trans-Pacific Partnership — a measure put in grave danger on Friday by a revolt among House Democrats — signal her silent support for the ambitious free trade expansion. What's worse, they say, is that her strategic silence renews suspicions about her authenticity.

"If you really want to be a leader, you really ought to say where you are on an issue," said Ken Sagar, president of the Iowa AFL -CIO.

"It was a missed opportunity," said New York City mayor Bill de Blasio, the progressive leader who has declined to endorse Clinton several times despite running her 2000 Senate campaign.

Even as organized labor and progressives prevailed on Friday with House Democrats holding firm against pressure from the White House to approve a measure needed to seal the larger trade deal, condemnation of Clinton was still swift and sharp.

"No one's surprised. No one. No one. No one," said New Hampshire liberal activist and radio host Arnie Arnesen. "The fact that she took no position is exactly what we expected … If you're running only to be safe, then how can you lead? How can you lead? I don't see leadership. I see fear."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

No wonder, said Arneson, that “progressives don’t trust her.”

Clinton has been in a tight position on the trade deal, a centerpiece of the administration’s pivot to Asia, which began during Clinton’s tenure as secretary of state. She risks being portrayed as a flip-flopper and alienating business interests if she comes out strongly against the negotiations for the 12-nation trade pact, while voicing support would alienate the progressive base she’s been eagerly courting.

“In some ways, for her, this was a damned-if-you-do, damned-if-you-don’t,” said Steve Rosenthal, a Democratic strategist with ties to organized labor, adding that Clinton has “a lot to prove” to unions on fighting for the middle class.

Labor leaders in Iowa said they reached out to the Clinton campaign as late as Tuesday to urge the candidate to oppose the trade promotion authority for the TPP, which unions maintain will harm American workers. Though Clinton has said in the past that “the TPP needs to include strong protections for workers, the environment, intellectual property, and innovation,” she has not weighed in on fast-track authority. The Clinton campaign didn’t immediately respond to a request for comment.

“I think by her sitting it out, it says she’s supported the president on this … I’m taking her lack of an answer as an answer,” said Steve Abbott, president of the Communications Workers of America Iowa State Council, who spoke to Clinton campaign officials this week.

Several progressives said Clinton’s silence was more alarming than vocal support of TPA and TPP would have been. “It’s almost worse to not take a stand either way,” said Christopher Schwartz, head of the Iowa chapter of the Americans for Democratic Action. “Even though we’re completely opposed to trade promotion authority and TPP, I’d much prefer to know where a candidate stands.”

It’s another indication that Democratic primary voters have concerns about whether Clinton is being straight with voters. A quarter of Democrats in a recent CNN poll said they wouldn’t describe Clinton as honest or trustworthy.

The contrast is particularly glaring in her contest against Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who vocally opposed the North American Free Trade agreement signed by Clinton’s husband and has been very specific on policy on the stump.

Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, another rival for the Democratic nomination who also opposes fast-track authority, have both taken shots at Hillary for her mushy stance.

“If she’s against this, we need her to speak out right now,” Sanders told reporters in Washington on Thursday. In a subsequent interview, Sanders agreed with the suggestion that her silence amounts to a “cop-out.”

US President Barack Obama and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi walk through a hallway after meeting with House Democrats at the US Capitol on June 12, 2015 in Washington, DC. President Barack Obama Friday went to Congress Friday for a frantic round of lobbying ahead of a crucial vote on his sweeping trans-Pacific trade agenda. The House of Representatives is expected to vote mid-day Friday on final passage of so-called Trade Promotion Authority, and while Republican leaders are confident they have the momentum to get it across the finish line, the vote remains a toss-up.

Clinton remains the overwhelming favorite to win her party’s nomination, and miffed progressives say she still has time to weigh in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Larry Cohen, who served as president of the Communications Workers of America until this week and continues to spearhead anti-TPP efforts, called Clinton's approach to the deal a "major disappointment," but said, "It's not too late. We expect and hope that Secretary Clinton will speak out."

Ilya Sheyman, executive director of MoveOn.org Political Action, called it "disappointing" that Clinton hadn't yet joined other Democratic presidential hopefuls on the issue, but said "she still has time to do so" with House Republicans looking at more votes next week.

Economist Robert Reich, who served as Bill Clinton's labor secretary, said he too was disappointed with Clinton's silence, but that ample opportunity remains to embrace a progressive economic agenda — possibly even during her much-hyped kickoff rally on Saturday.

"She is playing it very cautiously," said Reich. "The issues she's taken a position on — immigration, voting rights and criminal justice — are all commendable but they're not especially risky. They appeal to important constituents whose turnout on Election Day is critical. On the other hand, she hasn't yet taken on the structure of the economy. She may Saturday. I'm hoping she does."

How Would Hillary Clinton 'Reshuffle' Economic Inequality? // NPR // Mara Liasson – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign for president is about to enter a new phase. At her first big rally this Saturday in New York City, she will make an unusually personal speech about how her upbringing forged her commitment to helping others.

Soon after, Clinton will begin laying out her positions on a broad range of economic policy questions. In the past few months, we've learned her positions on immigration, campaign finance reform, voting rights, and gay marriage. But we don't know yet what she wants to do about the number one economic issue of the 2016 campaign — stagnating middle class incomes.

Clinton does talk about the economy a lot on the campaign trail, but so far only in broad strokes. She says she wants everyone to have the same chances she had — and that, as she said visiting a brewery in May, "here in Washington we know that unfortunately the deck is still being stacked for those at the top."

She says that her job is to take that deck and "reshuffle the cards" but what does that mean?

"Paramount is how we're going to have an economy that grows for everyone, that's inclusive, in which middle class families and people struggling to get into the middle class can get ahead as the economy grows," said Neera Tanden, an informal advisor to Clinton and president of the left-leaning Center for American Progress.

So would she address economic inequality the way Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders propose by breaking up the big banks,or increasing Social Security Benefits?

Right now, said former Clinton White House aide Bill Galston, it's really not clear.

"Clinton has very deliberately appropriated progressive populist phrases from the Warren wing of the Democratic party. That leaves entirely unanswered the question of what the full economic narrative would be when she spells it out," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She'll start spelling it all out Saturday in her big kick off speech. Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta said that's when Clinton will talk about the conditions of the country and "why people haven't seen their wages rise even as we've seen private sector job growth come back in this country."

He says she'll also talk about "what she wants to do to make sure that people get ahead and stay ahead. She'll lay out a template for that, and then through the course of the Summer and into the Fall she'll get specific about what policies she thinks she' can achieve to help people succeed in life," he said.

In those Summer and Fall speeches, Clinton will lay out her plans for college affordability, early childhood education, Wall Street reform and paid family leave. At some point she will say exactly how high she wants the minimum wage to be, and how she'd finance big investments in infrastructure. And, her aides say, she'll also eventually explain how she plans to solve one part of the income inequality puzzle — that even when profits and productivity go up, wages do not follow.

"The hard work, the productivity that you contribute to the the profitability and the success of the businesses that you work for should be reflected in those paychecks so that people feel that the work ethic is really paying off for them," she said last month.

Exactly how Clinton proposes to get productivity and wage growth back in sync will depend on why she thinks the middle class is struggling. Theres a big debate about this going on inside the Democratic Party. The Elizabeth Warren wing thinks the middle class is suffering because the top 1 percent grabbed more than their share. On the other side are Democrats who believes the deck is not just stacked, its been transformed — by the big forces of global competition and technology.

Clinton doesn't believe those dueling narratives are mutually exclusive, according to Podesta, and he said she will make that very clear.

"By the time people are going to the polls and voting, people will know exactly what she wants to do. And I think offer a vision that will be appealing to a broad section of Americans," he said.

Many of her supporters say the sooner she lays out that vision the better. Her unfavorable ratings have been growing, and majorities of voters tell pollsters that she is not honest and trustworthy. Neera Tanden thinks the best way to address those political problems is with a robust policy agenda. And it has the added benefit of playing to Clinton's authentic political strengths. As Tanden points out, Clinton is first and foremost a workhorse and a policy wonk.

"That's always been an asset for her," she said. "In a campaign in which you are continually discussing the way you want to solve people's problems is another way to communicate how you're on their side and care about their concerns."

So the question the Clinton campaign would like to ask is not whether she is honest and trustworthy but whether voters can trust her to fight for them and their families.

Hillary's star-studded bash replaced Rangel's party at the Plaza Hotel // Crains New York // Eric Engquist – June 12, 2015

It would be understandable if Rep. Charles Rangel feels a bit peeved that Hillary Clinton is throwing a star-studded fundraiser for her presidential campaign June 27 at the Plaza Hotel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was supposed to be Mr. Rangel's party.

According to an insider, the longtime Harlem congressman had planned to throw his annual birthday fundraiser at the same venue, on the same night, with the same stars—Lady Gaga, Tony Bennett, and, yes, Hillary Clinton.

But somehow it became a Hillary for America event. Tickets start at $2,700.

"They're doing the Charlie Rangel birthday gala," said the source, "without Charlie Rangel."

Two spokesmen for Ms. Clinton's campaign did not respond to an inquiry yesterday about the alleged turn of events.

For Mr. Rangel, his displacement is not just a personal slight but a significant financial setback. The veteran Democrat is desperately trying to retire the campaign debt from his 2014 re-election bid, which now stands at about $140,000.

At one time, Mr. Rangel's birthday event alone would have raised that amount several times over. When he chaired the House Ways and Means Committee, his gala took in $500,000 or $600,000. In other years, $200,000 or more would pour in.

But since then, Mr. Rangel, who was serenaded by colleagues on his 85th birthday yesterday in Washington, has been tarred by an ethics scandal, lost his committee chairmanship, been relegated to minority status in the House and announced that he will not seek re-election in 2016. Other than nostalgia, there is little reason for donors who transact in political currency to write Mr. Rangel a check anymore.

Mr. Rangel's fundraising prowess did recover as the toxicity he took on from his ethics problems abated. But anyone who has contributed the maximum allowed by law to his 2014 campaign can no longer give. Because donations are being used to pay expenses from that race, the contribution limits still apply.

It could not be determined yesterday whether Ms. Clinton is distancing herself from Mr. Rangel to avoid any risk to her White House bid. The congressman became a lightning rod for criticism by the Republican establishment when details of his transgressions emerged from 2007 through 2009, notably his failure to report $75,000 in rental income from his Dominican Republic beach condo on his tax returns.

It was also revealed that Mr. Rangel's campaign was housed in a rent-stabilized apartment, separate from the two combined apartments in which he resides and a fourth rent-stabilized unit. Rent-regulated housing may only be used as a primary residence.

Mr. Rangel was even derided for storing an old Mercedes in a congressional garage that was supposed to be used only for active vehicles.

"There's genuine affection for Charlie, especially in the New York delegation," the insider said. "I think they know that the mistakes he made, the mistakes his staff made, were not raw corruption and greed. There were no bags of cash. They were mistakes and errors, and he admitted to all of them."

Even if Ms. Clinton decides to steer clear of Mr. Rangel, according to the source, his camp is hoping Ms. Clinton will make up for the fundraiser switch by dispatching her husband, Bill Clinton, to the rescheduled Rangel birthday bash, now slated for August. The former president is still as much of a draw as his wife, who is the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination in 2016.

In the meantime, City Councilwoman Inez Dickens is hosting a $1,000-a-head fundraiser for Mr. Rangel in her Manhattan home Thursday. Ms. Dickens is an influential council member and an expected candidate for the Assembly seat that Keith Wright would vacate if he wins the Democratic primary for Mr. Rangel's House seat next year.

Answering the 'Why' : Previewing Hillary Clinton's Launch Speech // NBC // Chuck Todd, Mark Murray and Carrie Dann – June 12, 2015

As Hillary Clinton is set to appear at her first big campaign-style event on Saturday, it's worth remembering that she never gave a why-I'm-running-for-president speech at the beginning of her campaign in 2007. Her launch was a video of her speaking to the camera that she wanted a conversation with American voters. "Let's talk, let's chat, let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine." But there was nothing about WHY she was the best person to lead the country over the next four to eight years, or even WHY she wanted the job. By contrast, Obama answered the WHY in his Feb. 10, 2007 kickoff, using Abraham Lincoln's Springfield, IL as the backdrop:

By ourselves, this change will not happen. Divided, we are bound to fail. But the life of a tall, gangly, self-made Springfield lawyer tells us that a different future is possible. He tells us that there is power in words. He tells us that there is power in conviction... That's why I'm in this race. Not just to hold an office, but to gather with you to transform a nation." Obama's WHY: He was the only presidential candidate who could truly transform the country.

Here was even Mitt Romney's WHY at his presidential announcement in June 2011: "All of these experiences -- starting and running businesses for 25 years, turning around the Olympics, governing a state -- have helped shape who I am and how I lead... Turning around a crisis takes experienced leadership and bold action." Translation: I'm the businessman and turnaround artist this country's economy needs!

A sneak peak at part of the "why" Hillary will lay out on Saturday

The Clinton campaign insists we'll hear the WHY from her on Saturday. And we're already getting some clues about what it will be. First is the location -- Roosevelt Island in New York City -- as a way to invoke both Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. "Clinton chose a park honoring FDR in the state where she served as senator for eight years, a choice campaign officials say is meant to invoke Roosevelt's legacy," MSNBC's Alex Seitz-Wald reports. "'She could have chosen anywhere to make her announcement,' said Felicia Wong, the President of the Roosevelt Institute, a progressive think tank dedicated to carrying on the legacy of Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. 'By choosing this venue, she and her team have put themselves squarely in the legacy and the spirit of Franklin Roosevelt, who re-wrote the rules of the 20th century.'" Another clue is Hillary's expected focus on her mother. "As a child, Dorothy Rodham was abandoned by her parents and sent to live with strict relatives. Not able to bare it anymore, she ran away at 14 and worked as a housekeeper for a kind-hearted woman who took her in and showed her what parenting should look like. That trauma and resilience, Clinton has said, taught her and how to be tough and made her want to help people in difficult circumstances," Seitz-Wald adds. So, to put Saturday another way, it's fair to call it the first-EVER Hillary Clinton presidential announcement address Changes of conviction? Or changes of convenience?

In her speech tomorrow, Hillary is also expected to embrace being a progressive -- more than she ever did at this point in 2007. Yet don't forget that she has made quite a few position changes to get her: supporting gay marriage, backing immigration-reform changes beyond President Obama's executive actions, favoring drivers' licenses for undocumented immigrants, supporting normalization with Cuba. It will be interesting to see if these changes tomorrow come across as changes of conviction or changes of convenience/ One other thing to keep in mind about tomorrow: Delivering big speeches at rallies has never been one of Hillary's strengths.

Hillary Clinton is not on Snapchat, but we just found some compelling evidence that it's coming soon //
Business Insider // Will Haskell – June 12, 2015

It looks like Hillary Clinton is going to start campaigning on Snapchat any day now.

The presidential hopeful is already popular on Instagram after only two days on the service. So I tried to see if I could find Clinton on Snapchat — and it turns out, every name she could possibly use has already been reserved.

This means that either someone's planning a fake account, or the Clinton campaign is stockpiling the names themselves.

A Snapchat spokesperson wouldn't speak on the record about Clinton's possible involvement with Snapchat, and Clinton's press team has not responded to a request for comment.

If Clinton is planning a Snapchat effort, she won't be the first. Presidential contenders Martin O'Malley, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio already use Snapchat to share information about their campaigns.

I did some digging on Snapchat in an effort to figure out how and when Secretary Clinton will engage with the photo sharing platform.

I found that the following usernames are currently taken:

The "pending" message usually shows up when a user hasn't added you back yet because they've set their account to private. It also appeared when we tried to send a snapchat to Senator Rubio's account, which is already in action:

Excitement about Clinton's Snapchat plans exploded on Twitter shortly after she posted her first Instagram.

The photo and video sharing app is used by 50 million people, the median age of whom is 18, according to Forbes. Snapchat offers a valuable platform for candidates to engage young voters.

“There is no harder riddle to solve in politics than reaching young Americans who are very interested in the future of their country but don’t engage with traditional news,” Dan Pfeiffer, a former senior advisor to President Obama, told the New York Times. “Snapchat may have just made it a whole lot easier to solve this riddle.”

Snapchat has been staffing up in preparation for the 2016 election. In May, Dylan Byers at Politico reported that Snapchat was seeking "content analysts" to assist with 2016 election coverage. "We're looking for political junkies and news aficionados to join our team in NYC to help review Snaps that are submitted to Our Story events, and cover the 2016 presidential race and other news events for Snapchat," a job posting read.

Many have predicted that Snapchat will shape the 2016 election in the same way that Facebook and Twitter shaped the election of Barack Obama in 2008.

The former Secretary of State should have no difficulty attracting attention when she does begin to use Snapchat.

She cannonballed into the world of Instagram this week and already made a big splash.

In just two days, she's acquired 121,000 followers. That number blows Marco Rubio (with 13,000) Rand Paul (with 27,200) and Jeb Bush (with 11,900) out of the water.

Candidates Martin O'Malley, Bernie Sanders and Lincoln Chafee have a combined number of 11,358 followers. Clinton outpaces each of these Democratic opponents by over 100,000 followers.

Clinton's posts are also popular. This video, which rapidly summarizes Secretary Clinton's career in public service, received 10,400 likes.

This #tbt that she posted yesterday received over 13,000 likes.

That's more than twice the combined number of likes that Bush, Rubio and Paul received on their last Instagram.

Clinton, who's spent much of the last two months traveling New Hampshire and Iowa to speak about her accomplishments as a champion and leader of the American people, follows no one.

Bill Clinton opens up about his relationship with Hillary // CNN // Dan Merica – June 12, 2015

Bill and Hillary Clinton rarely talk about their relationship with one another. But in an interview set to air Sunday on CNN's "State of the Union," the former president opened up about the woman he said he trusts with his life.

"Whenever I had trouble, she was a rock in our family," Clinton said during an emotional interview with CNN's Jake Tapper in Denver.

"I trust her with my life, and have on more than one occasion," he said, describing his wife as someone who helped him through some of the most trying times of his life.

Bill Clinton described how his wife helped him through years "plagued with self-doubt" in his late 20s and offered him someone to not only lean on, but to help guide him through perilous moments in his career.

"I was the youngest former governor in American history in 1980 on election night. I got killed in the Reagan landslide," Clinton remembered. "People I had appointed to office would walk across the street, they were so afraid of the new regime in Arkansas, and would not shake hands with me. My career prospects were not particularly bright."

"And she never blinked. She just said, 'Hey. It'll turn around. I believe in you. You've got this,'" he said.

Close friends and aides of the Clintons regularly tell reporters about how close the couple, is despite operating on largely different schedules.

"I talk to him on the phone a lot," Hillary Clinton said in May when a voter asked where her husband was.

Bill and Hillary Clinton were married in 1975 after meeting at Yale University. Their relationship has been publicly tested a number of times, including during Bill Clinton's public impeachment trial and his affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

"The most difficult decisions I have made in my life were to stay married to Bill and to run for the Senate from New York," Clinton wrote about the Lewinsky affair in "Living History," her first memoir.

Though the two rarely speak about their relationship, they have opened up in the past.

During Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential run, Bill Clinton told voters in Ames, Iowa, that early in their relationship he told Hillary Clinton to dump him so she could focus on her own political career.

He said he thought she was "the most gifted person I'd ever met" and that it "would be wrong for me to rob her of the chance to be what I thought she should be."

Bill Clinton said she responded with a laugh and the now false response: "I'm not going to run for anything, I'm too hardheaded."

The former president said in 2014 that their relationship was, in a way, a 52-year pact.

"We were married a very long time when she was always, in effect, deferring to my political career," he said. "I told her when she got elected to the Senate from New York that she'd given me 26 years, and so I intended to give her 26 years. Whatever she wanted to do was fine with me. If she wanted to know my opinion, I would tell her, but she had carte blanche to make whatever decisions she wanted, and tell me what I was supposed to do about it."

So far, Bill Clinton hasn't played any role in his wife's presidential campaign. Although the former commander-in-chief will be with Hillary Clinton when she holds the first rally of her campaign on Saturday, he has yet to travel or raise money for her, something the regularly did in 2008.

Instead, Bill Clinton has been focused on his $2 billion philanthropic enterprise: The Clinton Foundation. His interview with CNN came during the annual meeting of Clinton Global Initiative America in Denver, where foundation supporters made nearly 80 pledges to address a wide array of domestic issues.

Bill Clinton reflected on their 40 years of marriage in his interview with Tapper.

"We built a life together based on the things we cared about, the things that we loved," he said. "We were blessed with a daughter who turned out pretty well I would say. We have been very blessed."

The entire Bill Clinton interview will air on Sunday at 9 a.m. on CNN's "State of the Union" with Jake Tapper.

One Tough Mother // Slate // John Dickerson – June 12, 2015

Tough mother. That's both the theme of Hillary Clinton's big speech on Saturday and the emerging theme of her campaign. According to a preview of her remarks, Clinton will talk about her mother's struggles and how they guide her and her campaign, which the candidate has fashioned around four tough fights. Since announcing her campaign in April, at every stop Clinton has said she will advocate for families, remove money from politics, increase wages for the middle class, and protect America. How is she going to do these things? She's going to fight.

The speech, like all campaign speeches, is an attempt to define the terms of the election in a way that highlights the candidate's attributes. (My presidential campaign, for example, would be founded on the obvious truth that the American dream can only be restored through asides and rejoinders made by blond, middle-aged fathers.) If Clinton is a scrappy fighter, why not define the election that way? It's not a stretch. This is what voters talk about when they describe what they want in a candidate. Does the candidate get my life and will she go to bat for me? Does she have my back? Political scientists will tell you that if voters forge that kind of connection with a candidate, they will then project all kinds of other favorable qualities on that person.

Clinton's strategy is one her husband often employed. No matter what personal or political troubles Bill Clinton found himself in, he always presented himself as a tireless fighter, someone who'd go into pitched battle for voters. The blunt political calculation is that even if voters don't find Hillary Clinton trustworthy—and only 42 percent do in a recent CNN poll—they will support the person who they think will fight for their interests. As Ron Brownstein has argued, Hillary Clinton doesn't need Americans to trust her.

Fight, fight, fight. Clinton rarely misses an opportunity to raise her gloves, even when she is making a joke about something else. "I'm aware I may not be the youngest candidate in this race," Clinton told Democrats in South Carolina in May. "But I have one big advantage: I've been coloring my hair for years. You're not going to see me turn white in the White House. And you're also not going to see me shrink from a fight." Friday the campaign released a Web video titled "Fighter." (If by now you haven't gotten the message, the candidate may have to come over and beat you up.)

There are other reasons the tough-mother pitch makes sense for Clinton. It establishes her genuine roots, which shows voters she is not distant from their concerns despite her newfound wealth. Bill Clinton did a version of this at the 1992 Democratic convention when the film The Man from Hope (a story also centered around a mother) helped upend the idea some voters had that he was a child of privilege. The message also allows Clinton to talk about her start in politics, which was founded around the kinds of fights she says she will wage now. She is not a newcomer to the fight for programs that help children and families. That display of continuity will help a candidate whose positions on aspects of immigration reform and same-sex marriage have changed since the last time she ran.

Clinton's framing speech comes after a week of conversation—kicked off by a New York Times analysis—about whether Clinton is going to run to the left at the expense of voters in the middle or run a more centrist campaign. The Clinton team argues it's a false choice. She can appeal to Democrats by talking about immigration reform, campaign finance reform, and same-sex marriage while appealing to the majority of independent and swing voters who hold those views, too. "It is a uniquely Acela corridor analysis to assume issues like paid medical leave or addressing corporate excess are 'base' issues," says David Axelrod, who is not associated with the Clinton campaign. "The economic pressures people feel are real and broad."

On an issue like immigration, for example, a recent Pew poll showed that 72 percent of the public favors some legal status for undocumented workers, a position that is closer to Clinton's than the one held by the majority of GOP candidates.

The Clinton team also argues that swing states like Ohio, Florida, and Iowa can't be won simply by turning out the Democratic base. Clinton is pushing for criminal justice reform, and so are several Republican candidates. She talks about the economic tilt toward Wall Street, and so does Rick Perry. Americans supported more government action to address the country's growing income gap by 57 percent to 39 percent in a recent CBS/New York Times poll. When she talks about portability of health care across state lines, she is consciously echoing a Republican position. If she were making a big pitch for the party's liberal wing, she would be advocating for a single-payer health care system as Vermont Sen. Bernie Sander is.

If anyone would like a preview of Clinton's mother-based speech, watch this recording of her appearance before thousands of camp counselors in March. At roughly the 52-minute mark, she gives a long answer about her mother's qualities. One story she tells is of her mother's advice after Clinton came home crying after being bullied: "There's no room for cowards in this house." That's one tough mother.

What It Means for Hillary Clinton's Campaign to Get Real Tomorrow // ABC News // Liz Kreutz – June 12, 2015

Saturday marks an unofficial, official turning point in Hillary Clinton's campaign.

The "ramp up phase" -- a term used by Clinton's campaign to describe the first two months of Clinton's candidacy -- will come to an end and her "official" campaign will kick-off.

This transition will be marked by Clinton's first big campaign rally at Roosevelt Island in New York City on Saturday, where Clinton will deliver a speech laying out her vision for her campaign, followed by a 5-day swing through all four early voting states: Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

So, what's really the difference between Part 1 and Part 2?

Here's how the new era of Clinton's campaign might differ, if really much at all, from the first one.

Growing Bigger

Part 1: In the ramp-up phase, Clinton has kept it small. Most of her campaign events have been low-key, intimate round-tables at local businesses, such as bike shops, craft breweries and coffee houses.

Part 2: Beginning Saturday, things are about to get bigger. In this next phase, Clinton will start hosting more large rallies and town halls. But, aides said, round-tables will still be part of the mix, too.

Getting Personal

Part 1: During campaign events so far, Clinton has spoken generally about policy and made mentions of her mother, father and granddaughter, Charlotte.

Part 2: Clinton's now about to get even more personal. Clinton's campaign released a video today about Clinton's life ahead of Saturday's rally. And on Saturday, Clinton is set to focus her remarks around the story of her late-mother, Dorothy Rodham, whose early life was full of trauma and abandonment. Clinton is expected to use her mother's story, and the lessons of resilience she learned from her, as a running motif out on the trail.

Expanding Access

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Part 1: As has been widely documented, Clinton has been criticized for keeping the media at arm's length during her ramp-up period.

Part 2: In this next era, Clinton is expected to have a much more open relationship with the press, or so we're told. Clinton's aides say she'll host more press gaggles, answer more questions, and even begin making big television appearances, too.

Getting Wonkier

Part 1: Clinton has delivered a few policy-oriented speeches over the past two months, but overall her campaign has been relatively light on proposing policies so far.

Part 2: We're now entering the wonky phase. Aides said Clinton is ready to roll out a number of specific policy proposals in a series of speeches over the coming months.

Changing Travel

Part 1: Clinton's early part of the campaign has brought us scenes of an "everyday" Clinton road-tripping to Iowa in her Scooby van and flying around the country on commercial flights.

Part 2: Clinton will likely continue to fly on commercial planes as much as possible, but as her travel schedule gets busier, it could prove to be a logistical challenge. Don't be surprised if Clinton also begins opting for private plane travel instead.

Increasing Family

Part 1: Clinton has traveled solo to all of her campaign events so far. Although she talks about her family on the trail –- namely her mother, father and new granddaughter –- Bill and Chelsea Clinton have been notably absent from the road.

Part 2: Bill and Chelsea Clinton will both make their first official campaign appearance at Hillary Clinton's rally on Saturday. But while their role on the trail will continue to pick-up throughout the next part of her campaign, neither are expected to do much campaigning any time soon.

Raising Money

Part 1: In this initial part of the campaign, Clinton has spent almost an equal amount of time campaigning as she has spent raising money for her campaign.

Part 2: Don't expect much difference here. So long as Clinton's campaign needs money, Clinton will keep up –- and probably ramp up -– her fundraising efforts.

Ragin Cajun: 'Put your pantsuit on and let's go!' // The Washington Examiner // Paul Bedard – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The old Clinton team is saddling up for their last roundup, this time for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton, set to re-announce her bid Saturday in New York City.

Longtime Clinton advisor James Carville is heading up her effort to win Virginia, which the GOP has declared a must win if they are to beat the former first lady and secretary of state.

Presumably in association of former Clinton aide and current Gov. Terry McAuliffe, Carville and Team Hillary plan to mount an aggressive fight to keep Virginia blue and in her column.

Carville, the Louisiana native known as the "Ragin Cajun," on Friday sent supporters an invitation to "let your hair down" and "put your pantsuit on" at a Clinton rally at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va., June 26.

He called her the "right person" to be president and he tied the expected popularity of the event to the GOP, writing, "Tickets are selling faster than Republicans deciding they're running for president."

Carville has been part of the Clinton family for years and is credited with helping Bill Clinton win his first election.

His full note is below:

You are invited to let your hair down (I would but I don't have any!) and join us for what is bound to be one fantastic evening.

On June 26th, Democrats from across the commonwealth are coming together to hear Hillary Clinton speak in Fairfax. And, you can join us too.

I have been a longtime friend and supporter of Hillary Clinton. There is no doubt in my mind that she is the right person to serve as president of the United States.

Hillary has bold ideas, but you won't hear what she has to say if you don't grab a ticket soon. These tickets are selling faster than Republicans deciding they're running for president.

Trust me, you won't want to miss this event. So, put your pantsuit on and let's go!

I hope you can join us to watch my friend Hillary on June 26.

Thanks,

James Carville

No-Fly Zone Ordered For Hillary Clinton's New York City Kickoff Rally // ABC News // Josh Margolin, David Kerley and Matt Hosford – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Federal officials today took the rare step of creating a "no-fly zone" around the site of Hillary Clinton's campaign kickoff rally in New York City on Saturday.

The Federal Aviation Administration established the protective zone in the form of a so-called "Notice to Airmen" announcing that a section along Manhattan's East Side will be temporarily transformed into "national defense airspace."

The FAA website lists the reason as "Temporary flight restrictions for VIP Movement" and cites the federal law that the FAA employs to ban flights over events attended by the president, vice president or other key dignitaries.

"The United States government may use deadly force against the airborne aircraft if it is determined that the aircraft poses an imminent security threat," according to the notice.

Clinton's rally -- planned as the largest event of her presidential campaign so far -- will take place on Roosevelt Island, a narrow sliver of land in the East River located between Manhattan and Queens.

As the wife of former President Bill Clinton, Hillary Clinton is still guarded by a Secret Service detail. The former president is expected to attend tomorrow's event.

"This is highly unusual," a spokesman for the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, told ABC News. The "no fly zones," also known as "Temporary Flight Restrictions" are issued about 1,000 times a year, according to the association. But they usually are not issued for candidates for president.

In a statement to ABC News, the United State Secret Service said it "establishes temporary flight restrictions in advance of protective visits" but did not elaborate.

The Clinton campaign did not respond to a request for comment nor did a spokesman for New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio.

City officials objected to the restriction because of the effect it is expected to have on popular sightseeing helicopters. The no-fly zone will not have any impact on commercial jets landing and taking off from nearby LaGuardia Airport.

When Clinton was first lady, such a no-fly zone was not established for appearances she made. And even now, the FAA typically does not put such restrictions in place for the current first lady, Michelle Obama, for events she attends unless her husband, the president, is there as well.

Clinton's Grassroots Army // The Sun Sentinel // Anthony Man – June 12, 2015

As she prepares to launch the second phase of her presidential candidacy Saturday, her campaign has been pursuing a less-noticed, but intense effort aimed at recruiting the army of grass-roots volunteers that could secure a victory in the 2016 election.

Her campaign has sponsored a series of gatherings throughout Florida to sign up supporters who will spend the coming months spreading the word at festivals, parades and other community events; invite people into their homes for house parties; and attempt to recruit friends, family and neighbors into the Clinton fold.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Much of the focus in the two months between the April 12 video in which Clinton announced her candidacy and Saturday's "official campaign launch" has been on Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada, the four states whose early primaries and caucuses give them outsized roles in deciding the presidential nominee.

Clinton's only Florida visit since entering the race was a May 28-29 fundraising tour that took her to Coconut Grove, Coral Gables, Parkland and Heathrow in the Orlando area.

The grass-roots organizing activity in Florida underscores lessons learned from Barack Obama's successful 2008 campaign, when early mobilizing helped produce legions of loyal activists who proved critical to his defeating Clinton for the Democratic nomination and winning the presidency. The Clinton campaign "really did get out-organized by Obama," said Kevin Hill, a political scientist at Florida International University.

"We learned from the Obama campaign," said Terrie Rizzo, who is officially neutral as chairwoman of the Palm Beach County Democratic Party. "Early organizing pays dividends."

Sandy Ducane, the Clinton campaign's Florida grass roots organizer — the only paid staffer in the state right now — told an early June gathering of volunteers in Pompano Beach why they're important.

"It's volunteer groups, it is the grass roots organizing that really is the engine that allows the candidate to move forward," Ducane said. "Debates and advertising and yard signs only take you so far in an election. And we all know that it's those sporadic voters, the occasional voters, [and] getting them out to vote is really what pushes a candidate over the finish line."

Even though it's nine months before the Florida presidential primary and 17 months until the general election, state Rep. Lori Berman, D-Lantana, a Clinton supporter, said it's not too early to start mobilizing. "When the time comes, you have your whole system in place and you're able to activate it and get everybody out there doing what they need to be doing," she said. "I hate to be trite and use cliches, but the early bird gets the worm."

Cynthia Busch, also neutral because she's vice chairwoman of the Broward Democratic Party, said starting now allows a campaign to make sure key volunteers are well trained, teams work well together, and existing volunteers can bring in new faces. "The sooner the better," she said.

Republicans said it's a good strategy. "I would say that's very smart for them," said Daniel Ruoss of Lauderdale-by-the-Sea, chairman of the Florida Federation of Young Republicans. "You can never start too early, certainly in Florida."

The Clinton campaign said efforts are under way in all 46 states that aren't part of the early four. But there's no place it's more important than Florida. Having won the Sunshine State's primary in 2008, Clinton can't afford the kind of embarrassment that would stem from anything less than a stellar performance in the state's March 16, 2016, primary.

And the Florida is critical to each party's hopes of winning the White House, given the Sunshine State's status as the largest swing state in the country — awarding more than 10 percent of the 270 electoral votes needed to win the presidency. The benefits of organized, well trained and loyal supporters could prove critically important in Florida if one of the state's Republican favorite sons, former Gov. Jeb Bush or U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio is the Republican nominee.

Hill said parts of Florida — "Broward and Palm Beach [counties] especially" — are Clinton territory. But that doesn't mean sufficient votes will come automatically in either the primary or the general election; Clinton needs to make sure her supporters are energized and turn out to vote.

And that's where people like Veronica Block come in.

Block, 44, who lives west of Boca Raton, said she's a regular voter, but has never been involved in any kind of political activity — until she she attended the organizing meeting in Pompano Beach.

Afterward, the recently widowed stay-at-home mother and part-time photographer did exactly what strategists want from all their volunteers: took to social media, telling friends why she likes Clinton and asking them to join her helping the campaign.

Block also signed up to join a volunteer team that plans to work the crowd on Clinton's behalf at the Kikin' It Country Music Festival on June 27. Block said she's ready to do "anything that I can do to help."

"I have never been as excited about anything like this," she said.

Most of the people, based on a show of hands, are veteran campaign volunteers. Carol Osno, a Democratic activist from Pompano Beach who has been involved in many campaigns, showed up wearing a Clinton button from 2008.

But there were other newcomers, like Block. Kathy Sklare of Deerfield Beach said the prospect of a Clinton presidency has her so excited that she's going to volunteer on behalf of the campaign.

"I've never liked politics. [But] I said to myself a while back, if Hillary runs again, I'm going to help her win," she said. "It's in my heart and my soul. I need to do it, and accomplish this. It's my goal. And Hillary, I love her and want to see her win."

The campaign has held 51 organizing meetings and house parties in Florida as part of the "Ramp Up Grassroots Organizing Program."

Other elements:

•Volunteers are hosting events in their homes Saturday, bringing together people to watch when Clinton delivers her launch speech from the Four Freedoms Park on Roosevelt Island in New York City before heading to Iowa. Florida supporters have 19 watch parties planned throughout the state.

•The campaign is holding small-scale fundraisers, such as a June 18 event headlined by former Florida Senate Democratic Leader Nan Rich of Weston. It costs $25, far less than the $2,700 required to attend one of the May fundraisers that featured Clinton in person.

Lisa Lickstein, a Democratic donor and activist in Palm Beach County, said small fundraisers do more than bring in money. "We know that people who give a small amount at the beginning of campaigns can be counted on to talk to their friends about why."

All the events are aimed at an exponential growth in numbers of people and excitement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One thing missing from the events is Clinton herself.

Unlike larger donors and voters in early states who get to see and hear the candidate in person, people who come to the organizing events have to make due with a life-sized, cardboard, cutout photograph of the former secretary of state, former U.S. senator and former first lady.

Cutouts are popular with Clinton supporters, with many taking pictures with their phones — and, like Block, sharing them on Facebook and Instagram.

When Lickstein organized a group that rented a booth at the SunFest music festival in West Palm Beach, she campaign got sign-up information from about 590 people willing to volunteer.

With an estimated attendance of 175,000 attending SunFest from April 29 to May 3, Lickstein said there was a constant stream of people who stopped to take selfies with "cardboard Hillary."

"There was just tremendous enthusiasm, really a great deal of emotion," she said. "People really wanted to connect with her."

Anita Mitchell, former chairwoman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party, said the South Florida reaction doesn't mean Clinton will prevail in Florida. The region, Mitchell said, is "progressive. It's liberal. It's her backyard. Low fruit for her."

Hillary Clinton headed to Charleston area for 2nd SC stop // The State // Jamie Self – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton is heading to the Lowcountry on Wednesday for her second visit to South Carolina since announcing her White House bid.

The 2016 Democratic frontrunner will hold a forum in the Charleston area focused on youth job training and apprenticeship programs, a campaign aide said, adding that more details about the stop will be released later.

The campaign has set up more than two dozen watch parties and launch-day house parties in the Palmetto State timed with Clinton's official campaign launch event Saturday in New York City.

The former first lady and secretary of state announced her campaign on April 12 and has been campaigning in early primary states in small, controlled events and roundtable discussions with students, educators and small-business owners.

Clinton made a one-day stop in Columbia last month, meeting with minority women business owners and speaking to a group of Democratic women gathered for a conference at the State House.

Hillary Clinton: "The History Of Women Has Been A History Of Silence" // Elle // Megan Friedman – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A day before her official campaign kickoff, Hillary Clinton released a new ad on YouTube that highlights her 40 years in public service.

The clip, called "Fighter," shows photos and footage from her entire career, from law student to Secretary of State. She talks about her work with children, and doesn't shy away from her failed attempt at healthcare reform while serving as First Lady. "You have to get up off the floor and you keep fighting," she says, a theme that she echoes throughout the ad.

The campaign video also talks about her historic speech in Beijing, where she declared, "human rights are women's rights, and women's rights are human rights," and her time as Senator from New York during the September 11 attacks. Whether or not you support her for president, nobody can deny she's had an incredible career.

Hillary Clinton's 'talking points' for 'friends and allies' just leaked // Business Insider // Hunter Walker – June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod sent out a memo containing "talking points" for "friends and allies" on Friday afternoon.

Business Insider obtained a copy of the memo, which includes a preview of Clinton's speech Saturday and details of the campaign's early efforts in primary states.

There has been much speculation about the role Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton, will play in his wife's campaign. The memo notes Clinton is "expected" to attend the speech, but will not be speaking.

"President Clinton and Chelsea Clinton are expected to attend, but the speaking program will feature Hillary Clinton exclusively," the memo said.

The memo, which was designed to help Clinton's supporters and campaign surrogates stay on message, also credits Clinton with taking "bold progressive stands on key issues" including "criminal justice reform," "immigration reform," and "voting rights," and "equal pay." The preview of Clinton's Saturday speech echoes what a Clinton campaign official told Business Insider about the remarks on Thursday.

Clinton announced her presidential campaign in April. So far, she has been in what her team has described as a "ramp up" phase with relatively small-scale events in early primary states. Saturday's speech will be the kickoff of a new phase of Clinton's campaign. The "talking points" memo sent out by Elrod included a segment on what "comes next" for Clinton's campaign including her plan to detail more specific policies "in the coming weeks and months."

"Hillary Clinton will lay out her vision on a range of economic issues that are key to helping everyday Americans get ahead and stay ahead," the memo said.

The memo also details Clinton's plans for the days immediately after the launch including events in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"The campaign has said we expect a competitive primary, and we've taken nothing for granted since the start of the campaign. This trip is the latest example that our focus is on the early four primary states and winning the nomination," the memo said.

The Clinton campaign did not immediately respond to a request for comment from Business Insider about the memo.

Meet the political operative trying to make Hillary Clinton popular // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 12, 2015

Michelle Obama is a hugely popular First Lady. But it wasn't always that way. As a candidate's wife in 2008, she stirred widespread indignation for suggesting that her husband's political rise was "the first time in my adult life I am really proud of my country."

Aides jumped to her rescue and started softening her image, granting interviews to women's magazines and steering clear of hot-button issues. But when Kristina Schake, 45, arrived in 2010 as the First Lady's communications director, she amped those efforts into overdrive. Remember the self-parodying "mom dance" with Jimmy Fallon? Schake's fingerprints were all over that one. Potato sack races across the East Room with the Late Night host (captured, of course, on Pinterest)? Schake. The supposed "undercover" shopping trip to Target? Schake again.

A master of political optics, Schake's job deputy communications director is to accomplish the same for former First Lady Hillary Clinton as the candidate tries to layer a warmer image on top of her leadership experience. Schake is also known as a stern enforcer of her boss' image, often to the consternation of many around her, including the press. But even her critics are in awe of her handiwork. On Obama's staff, Kristina was also credited with having helped recruit corporate partners to leverage thinly-resourced initiatives (think Disney DIS -0.61% and Walmart WMT -0.70% signing on to Obama's "Let's Move" campaign to fight childhood obesity.)

When Schake first approaches a mission, she does so with consideration and caution. "We both like lots of preparation, lots of reading, lots of wading around waist-deep in water before making a decision," says her big sister Kori Schake. In the case of Michelle Obama, she adds, "Kris watched her carefully, [studying] how to draw out what already exists—that warmth and caring. My sister found ways for her to express those traits in ways that would be comfortable for her in a public space."

Kristina Schake, the daughter of a Pan Am pilot, grew up traveling the world. Her sister Kori was eight years older, so Kristina and Kori were often wandering through cities by themselves. And invariably, they would land in art galleries and museums, roaming through some of the world's great collections of paintings and sculptures. "Her fascination with art is the key to why she is so great at her work," Kori Schake tells me. "She is incredibly good at seeing patterns on big canvases. She has a love for looking at art and understanding how it reflects underlying culture."

Kori—a scholar at Stanford University's Hoover Institution—is a Republican who served with George W. Bush's National Security Council and later as foreign policy and defense adviser to GOP presidential candidate John McCain. But that hasn't stopped her from being her sister's biggest fan—offering up what she considers to be the highest compliment available in national politics: "She is a ruthless political operative, and she'd be insulted if I didn't say anything else."

When the Schake girls and their brother were growing up in Sonoma, California (with two high school years in Berlin for Kristina), the politics they saw mostly consisted of their mother carrying a placard in favor of a school bond initiative. Kristina was a cheerleader and student council president before heading east to attend Johns Hopkins University.

Back in California after college, her career centered on helping the causes of liberal celebrities, such as actor/director Rob Reiner's push for a 50-cent cigarette tax to fund early childhood education. Schake also helped Maria Shriver, then California's first lady, to expand her star-studded women's conference. She worked with Al Gore's Live Earth concerts.

And with her public affairs partner, Chad Griffin, now president of the Human Rights Campaign, Kristina Schake fought Proposition 8, the California initiative to ban same-sex marriage. In what was to become a trademark Schake touch, she was able to humanize the gay plaintiffs in a court challenge to Prop. 8 that also brought together the legal dream team of conservative Ted Olson and liberal David Bois. In addition to her passion for gay rights, Schake was involved in a 2004 campaign supporting stem-cell research.

She took on a high-glam corporate job with L'Oreal in 2013, and later took leave in Germany, where she and her uber-patient boyfriend arrived and had to turn around within days when the Clinton camp came calling.

Watch for those Schake fingerprints all over the humanize-Hillary crusade. Clinton launched her campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire traveling in a "Scooby Doo" van named for the 1960s cartoon. Aides insisted it was Clinton's idea because the van reminded her of the characters' Mystery Machine.

But I suspect another source.

Schake.

New York Times fund keeps donors anonymous // Politico // Dylan Byers – June 12, 2015

The New York Times Neediest Cases Fund, a charity run by members of the Times Company's board of directors and senior executives, received more than $29 million in charitable contributions over the last five years from mostly anonymous donors, tax records obtained by the On Media blog show.

The Neediest Cases Fund's 990s show a total of $29,310,945 in donations between 2010 and 2014, but the Times does not provide a list of the donors. Eileen Murphy, the Times' Vice President of Corporate Communications, said "donations from trusts and estates of amounts more than $100,000 are generally invested in an endowment and are acknowledged or disclosed publicly," while "other donations (many thousands of them) are applied to the current year's campaign and are sent directly to seven social services agencies who work with the City's neediest."

"Our policy not to publicly acknowledge donors to the Neediest Cases Fund is in keeping with the common practice of the vast majority of charities and respectful of each individual donor's expectation of privacy," Murphy said. (Other newspaper funds, including those of The Los Angeles Times and The Chicago Tribune, do provide a list of donors, though those donors are asked to decide whether or not they would like to have their names listed.)

The Times' policy meant that the company did not disclose a $100,000 donation in 2008 from Bill and Hillary's Clinton Family Foundation, recently reported by the Washington Free Beacon. The Times has said that the CFF originally sent a $100,000 check to the fund in 2007, months before the paper endorsed Hillary Clinton in the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, then sent a replacement check in 2008 after the original went missing. Murphy has said that "this donation and our editorial board's endorsement of a candidate in the 2008 Democratic primary have absolutely no connection to one another."

In recent months, the Times has been a leading critic of the secrecy surrounding donations to the Clinton

Foundation, the global philanthropic initiative that has been at the center of controversy following reports that donations to the foundation may have influenced Hillary Clinton's actions as Secretary of State. (The Clinton Foundation is separate from the CFF.)

In April, the Times editorial board called on Clinton to provide a "full and complete disclosure of all sources of money going to the foundation" in order to lay such suspicions to rest. "It's an axiom in politics that money always creates important friendships, influence and special consideration," the editorial board wrote. "Wise politicians recognize this danger and work to keep it at bay."

The New York Times Neediest Cases Fund received $5,952,238 in donations in 2010, $5,543,976 in 2011, $5,906,280 in 2012, $6,535,759 in 2013 and $5,372,692 2014, for a total of $29,310,945 over the five-year period. These donations are administered by the New York Times Company and go directly to seven social services agencies in New York, including Brooklyn Community Services, the Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New York, and the Children's Aid Society.

O'MALLEY

Martin O'Malley hires digital director // MSNBC // Nisha Chittal – June 12, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley's presidential campaign has made two key new hires, bringing on two veteran digital strategists into high-level roles in the campaign, a spokeswoman confirmed exclusively to msnbc.

Madeleine Perry is joining the O'Malley campaign as digital director. Perry was formerly the digital director for Connecticut Democratic Sen. Richard Blumenthal, where she managed the senator's digital and social media strategy. She is a veteran in the digital political space, and her résumé includes work for the Democratic National Committee and Ohio Sen. Sherrod Brown's 2012 re-election campaign.

Additionally, the O'Malley campaign has also hired Ian Ferguson to serve as director of data and analytics. Ferguson served as national regional data director for the Great Lakes, Mid-Atlantic, and Northeast for President Obama's 2012 re-election campaign, and also has worked on data and analytics for a number of private firms.

O'Malley's digital team has a battle ahead of them to generate more buzz about their candidate on social media than his Democratic opponents, Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders. According to data provided by Facebook, 84,000 people on Facebook generated 120,000 interactions related to O'Malley on the day of his announcement. Compare that to Clinton, who had 4.7 million people generating over 10.1 million interactions related to her on the day of her April 13 announcement — and even Bernie Sanders, who had 592,000 people generating over 1.2 million interactions related to him on the day of his April 30 announcement.

But the campaign has already been finding ways to set themselves apart in the digital space — O'Malley is one of the few 2016 candidates actively using Snapchat, the messaging platform popular with millennials and teenagers. The campaign used the app to tease O'Malley's May 30 campaign announcement in Baltimore and has continued to use it to share behind-the-scenes moments on the campaign trail with Snapchat users. It's an early indicator that the O'Malley campaign seems willing to experiment with new platforms, and Perry's hiring will likely help shape a stronger digital strategy going forward.

HERE IS THE reality of the American economy. Despite an explosion in technology and a huge increase in worker productivity, the middle class continues its 40-year decline. Today, millions of Americans are working longer hours for lower wages and median family income is almost $5,000 less than it was in 1999.

Meanwhile, the wealthiest people and the largest corporations are doing phenomenally well. Today, 99 percent of all new income is going to the top 1 percent, while the top one-tenth of 1 percent own almost as much wealth as the bottom 90 percent. In the last two years, the wealthiest 14 people in this country increased their wealth by $157 billion. That increase is more than is owned by the bottom 130 million Americans – combined.

Over the last 40 years, the largest corporations in this country have closed thousands of factories in the United States and outsourced millions of American jobs to low-wage countries overseas. That is why we need a new trade policy and why I am opposed to the 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership now before Congress.

Large corporations and their lobbyists have created loopholes enabling corporations to avoid an estimated $100 billion a year in taxes by shifting profits to the Cayman Islands and other offshore tax havens. That is why we need real tax reform which demands that the very wealthy and large corporations start paying their fair share of taxes.

Corporate America has mounted vigorous anti-union campaigns, making it harder for workers to collectively bargain for decent wages and benefits. That is why we must make certain that workers are given a fair chance to join a union.

Meanwhile, US companies are buying back billions of dollars of their own stock in a way that manipulates stock prices, hurts the economy and, by the way, used to be against the law.

Instead of putting resources into innovative ways to build their businesses or hire new employees, corporations are pumping their record-breaking profits into buying back their own stock and increasing dividends to benefit their executives and wealthy shareholders at the expense of their workers. It is a major reason why CEOs are now making nearly 300 times what the typical worker makes. We must demand an end too stock buybacks.

We also must do a lot more to rebuild the middle class, check corporate greed, and make our economy work again for working families.

We need to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour over the next several years. With 70 percent of the economy dependent on consumers buying goods and services, the best way to expand the economy is to raise wages and create good jobs to increase the purchasing power of the American people.

We need to pass pay equity for women workers. It is not acceptable that women receive 78 cents on the dollar compared to male workers doing the same job.

We need to make certain that every worker in this country receives guaranteed paid sick leave and vacation time.

We need to encourage business models that provide employees the tools to purchase their own businesses through Employee Stock Ownership Plans and worker-owned cooperatives. Workers at employer-owned companies are more motivated, productive, and satisfied with their jobs.

It is time to say loudly and clearly that corporate greed and the war against the American middle class must end. Enough is enough!

Pelosi to oppose Obama on trade // The Hill // Christina Marcos – June 12, 2015

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) in a meandering but dramatic floor speech on Friday announced her vote against a measure providing assistance to workers displaced by trade.

“If TAA slows down the fast-track, I’m prepared to vote against TAA," Pelosi said.

Pelosi announced her opposition to the Trade Adjustment Assistance (TAA) program just before it went down in the House, with 302 lawmakers voting against it.

The failure of TAA could sink a broader trade package that includes President Obama's request for fast-track trade authority.

Pelosi's move is a rare split with Obama, who visited Capitol Hill on Friday morning and pleaded with Democrats to back the measure.

The California Democrat had been under pressure from liberal groups to oppose the trade package. While many had expected Pelosi to vote against fast-track, also known as Trade Promotion Authority (TPA), her opposition to TAA took many by surprise.

Pelosi argued that opposing TAA now would give Democrats leverage for a trade package they view as more favorable.

“We want a better deal for American workers,” Pelosi said.

A group of liberal House Democrats opposed to the trade package, including Reps. Rosa DeLauro (Conn.) and Brad Sherman (Calif.), applauded when Pelosi announced her opposition to TAA.

Richard Trumka, the president of the AFL-CIO who has been aggressively lobbying Democrats to vote against the fast-track deal, praised Pelosi in a statement just minutes after the TAA bill failed on the House floor.

"Nancy Pelosi has always fought for working families and today her leadership on the trade package vote was instrumental in the House voting against another bad trade deal," he said.

"She stood up against corporate interests and as always put first the people who are too often left out of trade agreement discussions. I applaud Rep. Pelosi’s bravery and leadership on this and look forward to working with her on good trade bills."

Trumka had previously threatened that Democratic senators who backed fast-track during a May vote will be held accountable, and warned that labor could sit out the 2016 elections over trade.

BUSH

Longtime Bush Adviser Focuses On Jeb's Messaging // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 12, 2015

In the last week, there have been numerous news accounts about reassignments and changes in the political team being put together by Jeb Bush.

But when the former Florida governor's advisers rolled out a list of staff appointments and titles this week, one name that was not on it was Chris Mottola. A veteran political advertising strategist who worked on George W. Bush's 2004 presidential re-election campaign, Mr. Mottola is said to be an old friend of Jeb Bush's longtime adviser, Mike Murphy.

Mr. Mottola's eventual role in the campaign once it begins next week is unclear, and a spokesman for Mr. Bush, Tim Miller, declined to comment. But two people familiar with Mr. Mottola's current role said that he had been advising the team on messaging and strategy related to Monday's planned campaign kickoff.

If Mr. Mottola does take an official role with the campaign, among the open questions is whether he would contribute on television ads. That role is currently expected to go to Jon Downs, of FP1 Strategies. Mr. Downs's colleague, Danny Diaz, was named campaign manager this week. Mr. Mottola did not respond to an email for comment.

Mr. Bush is not expected to actually begin airing television commercials until later in the Republican contest, but his aides confirm that he will spend money on a digital ad purchase pegged to his announcement tour next week. The purchase is aimed at building his list of both grass-roots supporters and small-dollar donors.

"We want to collect as much data and information as possible," Mr. Miller said.

Jeb Bush's Family Values // NYT // Andrew Rosenthal – June 12, 2015

In many campaigns, one candidate or another is asked to answer for comments he or she made in the past. The answer is usually gibberish – that was a long time ago, or I was trying to say something else. This week's entry is – not shockingly given how many times he has tripped over his own tongue lately – Jeb Bush.

The former Florida governor made some achingly stupid comments about welfare in the early '90s, when he was running (unsuccessfully) for that post for the first time, and in a subsequent book. The general strain of these comments is that women on welfare should quit whining and find a man.

"If people are mentally and physically able to work, they should be able to do so within a two-year period," he said in 1994 while running for governor. "They should be able to get their life together and find a husband, find a job, find other alternatives in terms of private charity or a combination of all three."

Mr. Bush also said: "How you get on welfare is by not having a husband in the house – let's be honest here." He added: “Men are not on welfare. That’s the point.”

The reason that more women were on Aid to Families with Dependent Children, a program that has changed its name since and its benefits, is relatively plain. The fathers of their children abandoned them. The program was designed for that purpose. There are not a lot of men on the Women, Infants and Children nutrition program either, Mr. Bush.

On Tuesday, there was some attention in the press to Mr. Bush’s 1995 book “Profiles in Character” (as opposed, of course, to Courage).

Here are some particularly insightful quotes:

“One of the reasons more young women are giving birth out of wedlock and more young men are walking away from their paternal obligations is that there is no longer a stigma attached to this behavior, no reason to feel shame.”

“There was a time when neighbors and communities would frown on out-of-wedlock births and when public condemnation was enough of a stimulus for one to be careful.”

So what does Mr. Bush think now? Don’t ask him, because you won’t get a real answer. On Thursday, traveling in Europe to pretend he has foreign policy experience, Mr. Bush said he was trying to focus on missing fathers and to say that single parents face a “huge challenge.”

“From the perspective of children it’s a huge challenge for single moms and it hurts the prospects, it limits the ability of children to live lives with purpose and meaning,” Bush said. Talk about profiles in character.

Jeb Bush plans a ‘hopeful, optimistic’ speech to kick off campaign // WaPo // Karen Tumulty & Ed O’Keefe – June 12, 2015

For six months, former Florida governor Jeb Bush has been running for president while demurring that he is not an official candidate. With the fan-dance phase of the campaign about to end, he offered a peek Friday at the "hopeful, optimistic" themes he plans to sound when he makes his formal announcement Monday.

Bush is spending the final days of his pseudo-candidacy on a swing through Germany, Poland and Estonia, part of an effort to burnish his credentials as a potential commander-in-chief.

“I’ve been thinking about what I’m going to say, for sure, and prior to this trip," he told reporters. "I hope that the message will be a hopeful, optimistic one. It won't dwell too much on the past. I will talk about why it is important to change directions. I will talk a little bit about, hopefully, the leadership skills that are necessary to solve problems."

He also indicated, however, that he will offer his two terms of governor of Florida as evidence of how he would run the country.

"I had the opportunity as governor of a state where a lot of things happened. Some people liked them. Some people didn’t. But there’s no question, you ask friend and foe alike, that Florida was changed by my leadership, and I think it changed for the better," Bush said. "And so I’ll talk about that. And there will be some lines of good humor as well, I hope."

When Bush first announced his interest last year, surprising many Republicans, he had seem poised to move to the head of the field as the favorite of the GOP establishment. But despite the advantages of his pedigree, his family's political network and fundraising capabilities, he has yet to break out in the early polls. One obstacle is the perception that he is too moderate for a party that has swung to the right.

Two days before Bush officially joins the crowded field of candidates running to be the 2016 standard-bearer, Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton will hold a major rally in New York City. Asked about her candidacy, Bush demurred for now, saying that domestic political battles should not be waged by candidates when they are overseas.

"Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state for four years under President Obama. She has a record. It is a record she will have to defend, and I believe that this is not an appropriate place to be talking about American politics," he said. "There will be ample chances to show the differences between myself and Hillary."

One challenge for Bush on that score will be navigating around his own last name, and the memories it invokes of the foreign policies of the last two Republican presidents, who happened to be his brother and father.

As he traveled through Europe this week, Bush often invoked the deft, widely admired manner in which the 41st president, George H.W. Bush, operated as the Cold War ended. He has not mentioned the more unpopular, unilateralist approach of his brother, George W. Bush, who was the 43rd president.

His itinerary reinforced those themes. On Friday, he was briefed by officials at the NATO Cooperative Cyber Defence Centre of Excellence here, which functions as a sort of think tank for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and is run by some of the member nations of that Western alliance. He also met with Estonian Foreign Minister Keit Pentus- Rosimannus, and was scheduled to dine with Estonian President Toomas Ilves at the presidential palace.

"If you think about it in terms of history, my dad’s managing of the cooperation with great leaders of his time, managing the fall of the Soviet Union, it has been talked about at every stop that we’ve made," Bush said.

He said that when he was in Poland on Wednesday and Thursday, he was often reminded of the 1987 speech that his father gave in Krakow, which the elder Bush insisted be carried uncensored on national television there.

"It was a spark," Jeb Bush said. "It was something that was so breathtaking for Poles who could never believe anything that they saw on television. Think about how much change has taken place in these years. It’s a good reminder that we're a lot freer now than we were, and we need to protect that freedom. And that’s why the United States needs to be engaged."

With Bush in Europe, aides at his campaign headquarters in Miami have spent the past few days putting the finishing touches on what's promised to be a dramatic and social media-driven launch.

Bush will launch his bid Monday afternoon at Miami Dade College with an announcement speech expected to last about 15 minutes. His remarks will touch on three general themes, according to aides familiar with the plans.

First, Bush will embrace the atmospherics of the campus, part of a public university system with more than 10 locations across South Florida that boasts the nation's largest Hispanic student body. Bush has spoken at the college several times, and his brother, George W. Bush, delivered a commencement address there in 2007. Aides said Bush considers the venue an ideal place to launch a campaign expected to make aggressive overtures to the country's expanding Latino voting population and other groups less prone to support GOP candidates.

Bush also plans to cast himself as a proven "fix it" agent, who revamped Florida's economy and government over eight years while enacting a conservative governing agenda. The defense of his record will serve as a direct contrast with the four presidential candidates serving in Congress: Sens. Ted Cruz (Tex.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), Rand Paul (Ky.) and Marco Rubio (Fla.).

Over the course of his early travels, Bush has often used the phrase "Right to Rise" — a moniker that is also the name of his leadership PAC and a super PAC poised to support his candidacy. Bush and his campaign are expected to provide a fuller definition of the phrase in the coming days, starting with testimonials from people who say they were helped by his work as governor or as an education reform advocate in the years since.

Once Bush launches his campaign, he's planning a whirlwind, three-day tour of New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina, with several public events and private meetings scheduled. Aides said that Bush is likely to continue the format of the public appearances he's held during his exploratory phase, which generally include a brief opening speech followed by roughly 45 minutes of questions from attendees.

On Friday, he also got an early boost of support from several senior Florida Republicans — a blow to Rubio, another popular statewide elected official.

Among those pledging to back Bush are Pamela Bondi, the state attorney general; Jeff Atwater, the state's chief financial officer; and Adam Putnam, the state agriculture commissioner. Eleven of Florida's 17 Republican congressmen are also backing him, including Miami's three Cuban American lawmakers: Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Mario Diaz-Balart and Carlos Curbelo. Several others, including Reps. Dennis Ross and Gus Bilirakis, have long ties to Bush, dating back to before he won the governor's office in 1998.

Jeb Bush Faulted Over Use of Florida Tax Money // WSJ // Beth Reinhard – June 12, 2015

The Republican governors who are weighing presidential campaigns often talk about the jobs they have created in their states, drawing a contrast to potential rivals who serve in a gridlocked Congress.

But one facet of the economic plans adopted by many GOP governors is coming under criticism from conservatives within the party—their use of taxpayer money to encourage businesses to expand or relocate across state lines.

Tax incentives and financial awards to businesses are increasingly out of favor in a party that sees corporate subsidies and the Export-Import Bank, which helps support U.S. exports, as examples of "crony capitalism."

The latest example of the rising opposition comes from the Club for Growth, a free-market advocacy group, which is criticizing former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush for overseeing state spending increases that included $310 million to lure a biomedical research institute to Florida.

The Club's appraisal of Mr. Bush's economic record, reviewed by The Wall Street Journal ahead of its release, says the effort to spur the biotech industry didn't generate as many jobs as promised.

"We want to frame what we think the right agenda should be for the Republican nominee, and when we see a candidate whose record shows they have used tax dollars to pick winner and losers, we are going to point it out as bad policy," said David McIntosh, the Club for Growth president and a former Indiana congressman.

"What was a standard approach for Republican governors for a while, we're now seeing a growing movement against," he said.

A spokesman for Mr. Bush, Tim Miller, said the state's investment in research institutes "diversified the economy, created high-wage jobs and contributed to significant scientific research advances."

At least three other active or likely candidates—Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry—are expected to face similar criticism from the Club for using tax dollars to promote economic development.

In 2012, the libertarian Cato Institute criticized Mr. Walker for tax breaks intended to draw business to the state, which the group said "clutter the tax code." In Texas, the Legislature has moved to curtail incentive programs touted by Mr. Perry.

The Club for Growth's report on Mr. Bush praises the former two-term governor as an aggressive tax cutter who vetoed $2 billion in spending and pioneered a Medicaid privatization program.

But it criticizes Mr. Bush for a $310 million package to persuade California-based Scripps Research Institute to build a research center in Palm Beach County. One state economic analysis said the deal could lead to 50,000 new jobs, but the Club's analysis says "the expansion of the biotech industry never materialized."

Mr. Miller, the Bush spokesman, said the Scripps money came from a temporary increase in the federal matching funds for Medicaid.

"Rather than increasing entitlement spending, Gov. Bush made a strategic one-time investment in a sector that is integral to economic growth," Mr. Miller said. He said 1.3 million jobs were created while Mr. Bush was governor.

Mr. Walker has defended state incentives to the Kohl's department store chain and is currently lobbying state and local lawmakers for a plan to spend $250 million in public money for an arena for Milwaukee's pro basketball team.

Mr. Christie awarded more than $5 billion in tax incentives since he took office in 2010, at a rate outpacing his Democratic predecessors. Critics have said that too many of the awards have gone to existing New Jersey companies moving within the state, rather than attracting new businesses. Mr. Christie's administration has said the incentives are essential to keeping companies in the high-cost state.

The Club, which is known for running attack ads against centrist Republicans, isn't planning to endorse a candidate in the GOP presidential primary. However, Mr. McIntosh said the group may run negative ads against Republican candidates who have raised taxes, and it already aired one such spot about former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

Along with corporate subsidies by state governments, the Export-Import Bank has become a top target of the Club for Growth. It is running ads against Ex-Im supporters in Congress noting that several GOP presidential candidates oppose the federal agency.

Here's Jeb Bush Talking In 1995 About Restoring Shame To Society // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski & Megan Apper – June 12, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's push to restore shame to society appears to have been a part of his regular stump speech as head of the Foundation for Florida's Future, an organization he founded to stay publicly active during the time between his first, failed run for governor and his second successful run.

In a chapter "The Restoration of Shame" of his 1995 book, Profiles in Character Bush bemoaned the loss of the stigmatization of having children outside marriage and the need to restore shame to society for having kids out of wedlock, taking public assistance, and in schools. He fondly cited the use of corporal punishment in one school district to institute shame noting the school district had never had a school shooting.

In an October 1995 speech on public policy in Georgia, Bush made similar remarks on the need to restore shame to society. Bush singled out public assistance and the lack of the "shotgun wedding" as key areas where there was less shame than the 1960s.

"First, we need to restore shame," Bush said. "There is no shameful behavior anymore in America. You can do just about anything you want to do, and no one minds. In fact, we are so numbed by what's happened around us that we've turned it off.

Bush described a conversation about a young student killing a each shrugged off by a bystander as an ordinary event.

"As I've described, my disgust and sadness for a teacher getting killed by a 10 year old, how troubling that is — I was in an elevator and the person next to me kind of shrugged it off and said, 'Well, it happens all the time.' And I can understand how people respond to this, because, if you don't, you can go crazy. If you saw the things that are going on it would be very difficult to do it. So the natural response is to say, 'Well, that's just the way it is.' I don't think so."

Bush said the "sense of shame" needs to be restored to society so certain attitudes become perverse in your family, neighborhood, and community.

"I believe that we need to restore a sense of shame, so that certain behavior makes you blush. Certain behavior becomes such that you don't accept it. And little by little perhaps that type of attitude becomes perverse not just in your family, but in your neighborhood, and perhaps in your community. And over time begin to restore a sense of shame for behavior that is outrageous."

Bush said such shame existed in the 1960s saying in that decade many people declined public assistance and adoption was a more accepted option for newly born children than abortion.

"It is the type of shame that existed for example in the 1960s, when half of the people who were qualified to accept public assistance didn't take it because they thought it was shameful. It's the type of activity that made adoption a much better option than bringing a child to term without the ability to take care of that child or abortion. It's sense of shame that created the shotgun wedding. Does anybody hear about the shotgun wedding anymore? It's the sense that used to exist about people who were very talented or intelligent cheating in school. It's the sense we don't have that makes our culture so debased and so appreciated over time."

On Thursday, Bush spoke about the book with reporters during his European trip.

“As it relates to the book, the book was written in 1995,” he said. “My views have evolved over time, but my views about the importance of dads being involved in the lives of their children hasn’t changed at all. In fact, since 1995, if you look at the — I spoke in the book about cultural indicators — the country has moved in the wrong direction, the 40-plus percent out-of-wedlock birth rate and you think about this from the perspective of children, it puts a huge, it’s a huge challenge for single moms to raise children in the world that we’re in today. And it hurts the prospects, it limits the possibilities of young people being able to lives of purpose and meaning.”

How a silent FEC lets Jeb Bush play by his own fundraising rules // CNN // Karl Sandstorm – June 12, 2015

No one would dispute that competitors, regardless of their sport, are entitled to know what the rules are. Basic notions of fair play require that the rules be known and enforced even-handedly. Yet when it comes to elections, there appears to be no rule book, and the umpires seem reluctant to make any politically tough calls.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's long-standing claim of non-candidacy -- expected to finally end in coming days -- has highlighted the complete inattention to basic fairness in campaign financing by the very regulatory agency responsible for its oversight.

For months now, Bush has avoided actually saying he is a candidate, while fully acting as if he is one. Bush's campaign claims he is not breaking any rules by raising unlimited funds -- tens of millions of dollars -- from individuals, corporations and trade groups that would be illegal and subject to possible criminal prosecution if he indeed were a candidate. Federal law prohibits corporations, trade groups and labor unions from contributing directly to candidates, and limits an individual's donations to $2,700 per candidate in an election.

Is the Bush "non-campaign" evidence that the law can be easily evaded?

Whether the answer is yes or no, someone needs to make the call. The key decision maker in this case is the Federal Election Commission, a six-member panel (three Republicans and three Democrats) that has -- on this issue and on a host of others -- failed in its most basic responsibility to tell the public what the law is. Just a few recent examples demonstrate the agency's failure to make timely critical decisions.

For one, federal law prohibits foreign nationals from making contributions and expenditures in any election. Does this broad prohibition cover money spent to influence the outcome of a ballot measure? Or can a foreign government spend unlimited sums seeking to influence a state or local referendum? Commission regulations simply do not provide an answer.

There was however, a complaint on which the Commission deadlocked in April. The staff's legal analysis in that case suggests that foreign nationals and governments may spend unlimited funds to influence state and local ballot measures. If the Commission indeed believes that this spending is lawful, it should act and propose a rule allowing foreign governments and corporations to influence ballot measures rather than not making a call at all, which is what it chose to do. The public and Congress would then have the opportunity to weigh in on the proposal as well.

Another example is the provision of federal election law that prohibits government contractors from making contributions in federal elections. Can that law be easily circumvented by having the parent company of a government contractor make the contribution? Or, if the parent is the government contractor, could a wholly-owned subsidiary company make the contribution?

Despite recent enforcement matters that have raised these questions, the Commission has failed to produce a regulation that provides an answer. This leaves open the possibility that major federal contractors may find an easy -- and profitable -- avenue around the prohibition.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A last example of a major question of federal election law that the Commission is leaving unanswered is whether the dozens of organizations that are spending tens of millions of dollars to influence our federal elections must disclose their donors to the public. The Commission has provided little useful guidance.

As a consequence, the public is being left in the dark not only about hundreds of millions of dollars that will be spent in the coming year to influence who will be our next President, but also about whether the law allows these vast sums of money to go unreported. Again, whatever the answer may be, it should not be a matter of private thinking among the Commissioners. The public is entitled to know the rules and expect that they will be enforced.

It should come then as no surprise that a "non-candidate" such as former Gov. Bush believes the continuing silence of the umpires is license to play ball by his own rules. As the players take the field for next year's elections, they should all have the same rule book and have confidence that the Commission will ignore the booing and make the tough calls. If you get paid to be an umpire, you need to do your job.

Bush book from 1995 becomes 2016 issue // USA Today // David Jackson – June 12, 2015

A book on character co-written by Jeb Bush in 1995 had been all but forgotten — until he decided to explore a White House bid in 2016.

Now Democrats are spotlighting passages of the book Profiles in Character in which Bush called for “the restoration of shame” to help combat out-of-wedlock births, youth crime and destructive behavior in general.

“It seems that any life decision that diverges from Jeb Bush’s carefully curated life is deserving of shame,” says a Medium post by Lauren Dillon, research director for the Democratic National Committee. “Anyone who is struggling to make the best of a difficult situation should be ridiculed.”

Asked about the book during this week’s trip to Europe, Bush said many of his views have “evolved” since its publication in 1995, “but my views about the importance of dads being involved in the lives of children hasn’t changed at all.”

Most of the criticism surrounds the comments about single motherhood and parenting.

The Bush book says that “one of the reasons more young women are giving birth out-of-wedlock” is that “there is no longer a stigma attached to this behavior.”

Bush told reporters that his ire is not directed at women, but at men who abandon their responsibilities as fathers.

The nation continues to move in “the wrong direction” on the out-of-wedlock birth rate, Bush said, and “it’s a huge challenge for single moms to raise children in the world that we’re in today … It hurts the prospects, it limits the possibilities of young people being able to live lives of purpose and meaning.”

Bush and aides said he tried to combat these challenges as governor of Florida by stepping up enforcement of child support payments and increasing punishments for domestic violence.

With the women’s vote a crucial part of the 2016, look for Democrats and perhaps other critics to cite passages from Bush’s 1995 book on character.

Wrote Dillon of the DNC: “So now that we’ve had a lesson in Jeb Bush’s “character,” let’s not forget how he really feels about you, your family, and your friends when he launches his campaign to be our next President.”

Jeb Bush to women on welfare in 1994: 'Get a husband' // CNN // Eric Bradner – June 12, 2015

Jeb Bush insisted during his unsuccessful first run for the Florida governor's office that an alternative to welfare for women is to "find a husband."

The Republican 2016 presidential contender's comments came in the heat of a 1994 campaign that has come back to haunt him -- particularly as he seeks to run an inclusive campaign aimed at broadening the GOP's appeal.

That year, Bush, with a more strident style and in a different era in the debate over welfare reform, saw a controversial remark he made in July seized on by reporters and by his opponent. Bush said that marriage is one of three options for women to get off welfare assistance.

"If people are mentally and physically able to work, they should be able to do so within a two-year period. They should be able to get their life together and find a husband, find a job, find other alternatives in terms of private charity or a combination of all three," Bush said.

Bush's comments were well-publicized at the time, and have occasionally popped up in coverage of his presidential campaign since then. But they've taken on new importance in the wake of reports this week of similarly controversial social commentary in a 1995 book.

Bush sought to explain his book's commentary that single parents face less public shaming during a press conference in Europe on Thursday, saying he meant to focus on missing fathers and that children born to single parents face "huge challenges."

"From the perspective of children it's a huge challenge for single moms and it hurts the prospects, it limits the ability of children to live lives with purpose and meaning," Bush said.

In 1994, when Republican primary opponent Jim Smith hit Bush for those comments in a television commercial, Bush didn't back away in a September news conference.

"How you get on welfare is by not having a husband in the house -- let's be honest here," he said.

"Men are not on welfare, that's the point," Bush said. "That's the point -- men are not on AFDC."

It was a reference to Aid to Families with Dependent Children, a federal welfare program that was ended in 1996 and replaced by the more restrictive program Temporary Assistance for Needy Families.

Bush's refusal at the time to back away from his comments were interpreted by Florida media as a signal he expected his stance to assist him in the GOP primary.

Bush's comment that men don't receive Aid to Families with Dependent Children benefits wasn't quite right, a state Health and Rehabilitative Services Department official told The Palm Beach Post at the time.

A "small percentage" of the program's support goes to men, the official said, and about 5,000 of the families that received benefits were headed by a male and a female, compared to 250,000 families total collecting benefits.

Bush's social commentary on marriage from the 1990s has caused his campaign headaches in recent days.

An excerpt from his 1995 book "Profiles in Character" was published in news reports Tuesday. In it, Bush asserted that out-of-wedlock births were caused by single parents no longer being shamed and ridiculed.

"One of the reasons more young women are giving birth out of wedlock and more young men are walking away from their paternal obligations is that there is no longer a stigma attached to this behavior, no reason to feel shame," he wrote. "Many of these young women and young men look around and see their friends engaged in the same irresponsible conduct. Their parents and neighbors have become ineffective at attaching some sense of ridicule to this behavior. There was a time when neighbors and communities would frown on out-of-wedlock births and when public condemnation was enough of a stimulus for one to be careful."

In another section, Bush wrote that a lack of a father is a good indication of who will ultimately contribute to "social ills" and have children out of wedlock in the future.

"For young girls, there is a correlate effect of fatherlessness that can be measured by sexual activity and the rate of out-of-wedlock childbearing. Studies have shown that girls who grow up without fathers run a greater risk not only of adolescent childbearing but of divorce as well," he wrote.

Jeb Bush's 2016 launch strategy: Be the tortoise, not the hare // CNN // Dana Bash – June 12, 2015

If the 2016 presidential campaign was boiled down to a fable, Jeb Bush's would be the one about the tortoise and the hare, and he would be the tortoise -- slow, steady and ultimately, the winner.

In conversations with multiple Bush advisers and confidantes in the run up to his official White House launch Monday, a singular theme emerges from inside his close-knit world: Patience.

Team Bush seems to say it as much to remind themselves, as they do the pundit and donor classes. They know patience is not an easy watch-word when today's politics moves at warp speed.

"It doesn't happen in a day," said Al Cardenas, Bush's long time friend who will serve as a senior adviser on his presidential campaign.

Perhaps pleading for patience is a sign that Bush is too old school to succeed in this insta-world of immediate gratification and results. Or, as his advisers insist, it's proof that he's the adult in the room who can see beyond the here and the now -- not just for his own fate, but for the country.

"We all cover this kind of in the here and now, and who's winning and who's losing is important, and I respect that," Bush told reporters in Germany this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"But if you have a strategy, and you think about it over the long haul, is the better approach at least for me," he said.

Regardless, being the tortoise not the hare reveals a reality inside Bush world as he prepares to make his candidacy official: he's not going to run away with a quick and easy path to the Republican presidential nomination. Not even close.

His failure to pull ahead in the polls, much less scare any of his more than dozen potential competitors away from running makes that fact painfully obvious.

And then, there's the calendar. Bush aides are not playing the typical lowering expectations game when warning they might not win in early contest states. It's not being coy -- it's a real challenge.

The first caucus state of Iowa is more obvious fertile ground for a Midwestern governor, like Scott Walker, or another candidate running as a social conservative who can also appeal to the desire for an outsider.

Advisers say they see their best first shot at winning in New Hampshire, but the Bush family -- both George H. W. Bush and George W. Bush - had mixed results in that primary over the years.

They feel their best bet is on the long game, gobbling up delegates during big multi-state contest days later in 2016.

The only way to test that premise is to be prepared to settle in for the long haul with money and manpower -- which Bush advisers say they have done.

"Since Eisenhower, every single nominee that the party has come up with is the nominee who has had the best resources and the best organization and so far that's Jeb Bush," Cardenas said.

"I consider Jeb Bush the favorite to win this thing just because we hit every mark that every other successful nominee has hit, and in a more significant way than any other candidate," he added.

To bolster that -- especially the fundraising part of the equation -- not only will the Bush team release record money totals for his Super Pac and pac in the coming weeks -- they are also working to raise big dollars for his actual presidential campaign as soon as it starts Monday-- which is much harder to do because of limits.

Bush's finance director has already asked bundlers -- donors who help coordinate and raise money from other donors -- to raise $27,000 between Monday and the end of the month.

Bush advisers say to expect an announcement speech Monday that reflects the only kind of campaign he said he would run when launching his exploratory phase in December, and that is an optimistic one.

Those close to the former Florida Governor say he has made clear internally that he will play hardball politics when necessary, but he won't set a scare tactic tone from the stump, even though he admits it may make it easier to get some GOP votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I kind of know what my job is, it's to develop a message that's hopeful and optimistic about the future of the country, to develop ideas that will give people a sense that they can lift up, and to tell them about my leadership skills to make it so," Bush told reporters here in Europe.

Bush aides privately admit that, after being out of politics and public office for 9 years, it has taken some time for him to shake off the rust. Several days of stumbles last month on what should have been a well-rehearsed answer on the Iraq war his brother started, was the starkest example.

But getting polished again politically has been a work in progress in less extreme ways as well -- like finding his own patience with voters in town hall settings asking him off the wall questions - the kind candidates who slog through Iowa and New Hampshire either become so used to it helps them succeed, or disdain so much it comes through and makes it hard to connect.

Still, Bush confidantes insist many of those "what are they talking about" moments on the trail are actually an intellectual rush for Bush, a self-described policy wonk who likes a good chance to spar about ideas.

On this five-day trip to Europe, Bush -- who is known for flashes of impatience and being stubborn, has shown he is getting more practiced at the happy warrior thing.

Through three countries in five days, meetings with world leaders and interactions with the American press traveling with him, he has been staying on message -- seeming to enjoy not only private discussions, but also playing tourist (something his brother, George W. Bush, famously had little patience for and did not do much when traveling as president).

Inside his Florida headquarters, they know one of the biggest challenges Jeb Bush still faces is his last name. Sources admit one of his biggest hurdles will be making voters see him as Jeb, not just another Bush.

"It's going to take a while for voters to get beyond the Bush identity to a Jeb identity," admits Cardenas, not just a close friend of Jeb's, but the entire Bush clan.

In fact, Bush advisers say he hasn't been able to pull ahead of the pack because of his name, not despite of it.

They insist comparisons to George W. Bush in 2000, when he was able to clear the field by building a big war chest and locking up talented staff early, are unfair -- because the Bush name was a plus back then. At that time there was a bit of GOP nostalgia for his father, George H. W. Bush, who was defeated by Bill Clinton in 1992.

Now, in the 2016 election cycle, the Bush name for many Republicans means big spending and government bailouts. Nevermind that it is the ultimate establishment dynasty -- at a time when even unaffiliated GOP strategists say there is a clear yearning for an outsider.

What staff shakeup?

Bush confidantes both inside and outside the campaign insist the buzz about internal turmoil and squabbling -- prompted largely by his sudden decision to replace his campaign manager and move him into a senior adviser role -- is way overblown.

They argue that what Bush said publicly isn't spin, it's actually true -- now that as he got to know these men and what their strengths are, he realized they would be better off moved around.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But that does speak to another Bush challenge unique among most other top tier candidates. Despite being an established political presence, he has been out of the game for nearly a decade and is forming a campaign team from scratch.

Unlike most of his competitors who are currently in office and have political operatives and policy aides around they know and feel comfortable with, Bush only has a small but fiercely loyal kitchen cabinet led by long time aide Sally Bradshaw, and includes GOP consultant Mike Murphy, who will run Bush's Super Pac, which means, by law, as of Monday the two will not be able to talk political strategy.

A challenge for Bush going forward is expanding his circle and extending trust and confidence in new people.

Al Cardenas is in that small circle of old friends. He says he has wanted Bush to run president for years, and that Monday will be emotional for him, and for Jeb Bush himself.

"He's spent a lot of time thinking about this -- a good chunk of 2014. -- He's been traveling the country and making sure if he did this he could do it in a positive way and that he could find a structure where his message can get across, and I believe he's confident he has done that and can do that," Cardenas said.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio is now at the top of the Republican presidential field // WaPo // Chris Cillizza and Aaron Blake – June 12, 2015

Look at any national poll on the 2016 Republican presidential race and you will see somewhere between three and five candidates clumped at the "top" of the field — all winning somewhere between 9 and 14 percent. It's fair, given that clumping, to conclude that the race lacks a front-runner.

But there's a difference between a race without a clear front-runner and a race in which there's no discernible momentum among the top tier of candidates. And what we currently have is the latter, not the former.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio is the candidate trending upward in that top pack. It's a trajectory he's been on since he announced his candidacy almost two months ago. Rubio's charisma, personal story and youth have combined to make him the "it" candidate for the GOP at the moment.

Rubio has also been helped by the slippage of his two main rivals for the nomination: Jeb Bush and Scott Walker. Bush weathered a very difficult last week — shaking up a campaign that he hasn't even announced yet amid faltering poll numbers and whispers that his fundraising might fall short of its goals for the first six months of the year. Walker has largely stayed out of the glare of the national media over the past six weeks or so, but his brief foray on the big stage earlier this year — think "I don't know" if President Obama is a Christian — weren't exactly confidence-inspiring for Republicans looking to see if he is ready to take the helm.

Beyond that top three, most unaligned Republican strategists we talk to — and there aren't many since roughly 200 people are running for the GOP nomination — see a significant drop-off in the likelihood of any of the remaining candidates winning the nomination. The most common name we hear as an alternative to the Big Three is Ohio Gov. John Kasich. And it's possible, but he remains in the very early stages of a candidacy (he's not announced yet) so we'll play a bit of wait-and-see for him.

Add it all up and you get Rubio, the youngest member of this massive GOP field, as a first among equals. For now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Below are the 10 candidates seen as having the best chance of winding up as the nominee. The rankings are determined by polling, conversations with various Republican strategists and a pinch of our own sense of things.

To the line!

10. Bobby Jindal: The governor of Louisiana is running: That we (almost) know for sure. The formal announcement is set for June 24 in downtown New Orleans. But Jindal's standing is his home state is dismal, and there's very little excitement about him in national GOP circles. His best hope is to hang around the race long enough that voters tire of a lot of their other options. (Previous ranking: 9)

9. Rick Perry: The former Texas governor seems genuinely excited about his second run for president. He even ran onstage at an event in Iowa last weekend. It's somewhat surprising for a guy who once didn't really seem that interested in running for president and then, when he did run in 2012, ran a disastrous campaign. But Perry is the longtime governor of a huge state. And American politics loves a reclamation project, right? (Previous ranking: 10)

8. Chris Christie: Christie and his team insist they are taking the long view on 2016. No, he isn't where they want him to be today, but regular people still aren't paying any attention and won't be for some time. Christie got some good news this week when the New Jersey state Supreme Court affirmed the legality of his cuts to the state's public employee pension fund. He's also staffing up. (Previous ranking: 8)

7. Mike Huckabee: The former Arkansas governor and 2008 Iowa caucus winner keeps litigating the culture wars — something the larger GOP probably doesn't want but still speaks to a key audience in the party, particularly in Iowa and South Carolina. Huckabee is the top claimant to the social conservative mantle in the field, and he's broadly popular in the larger GOP, but we're still waiting for him to show he's running the caliber of campaign that can actually win the nomination — in large part the fundraising aspect. (Previous ranking: 4)

6. Rand Paul: The conventional wisdom among the GOP smart set about the Kentucky senator has changed completely since the start of 2015. At that time, there was a sense that Paul had a real chance at being the nominee based on his strong base among libertarian-leaning Republicans and his appeal to other, less-vocal GOP constituencies. But the heightened concern within the Republican rank and file about national security and terrorism badly complicates Paul's noninterventionist views. Even if Paul wins every libertarian vote in the primary, if he can't expand beyond that bloc, it won't be nearly enough. (Previous ranking: 5)

5. John Kasich: Nobody benefits from Bush's stumbles as much as the Ohio governor. Both are pretty clearly running for GOP establishment support, and Kasich recently suggested his window is larger if Bush doesn't run strong. That's totally accurate. But we also have yet to see Kasich really debut on the national scene. And his 2000 presidential campaign was hardly a tour de force, ending shortly after it began. He moves up because it looks like he's going to run and Bush looks weakened. (Previous ranking: 7)

4. Ted Cruz: Here's what the Texas senator has going for him: (1) unquestioned dominance in the tea party lane of the primary, (2) deeply committed supporters and (3) a group of well-funded super PACs backing him. In a very crowded field, that likely means Cruz will be able to stick around for a very long time. But if he ever makes it into a one-on-one fight with any of the people rated higher than him here (Nos. 1-3), it's still very hard to see him winning that battle. (Previous ranking: 6)

3. Scott Walker: Walker, as we mentioned above, has kept a low profile these last few months. What Walker does have is momentum in Iowa where he and his team are — smartly — lavishing time and money. Iowa is a state that Walker probably has to win given that neither New Hampshire nor South Carolina seems like a place where he is a natural fit. At the moment, he's probably the favorite to do just that. (Previous ranking: 3)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. Jeb Bush: Bush's struggles mask the fact that he's still very likely to be the best-funded candidate in the field, and he's broadly liked within the GOP establishment. Put plainly: Republican power brokers aren't going to desert him until it's clear that his goose is cooked (or close to it). And there is so, so much time left in the primary. At this time in 2008, after all, we were talking about whether John McCain was done for. (Previous ranking: 1)

1. Marco Rubio: See above. (Previous ranking: 2)

Who's Laughing Now? Marco Rubio Mocks New York Times Article on His Finances // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 12, 2015

Florida Senator Marco Rubio joked with Republican bigwigs Friday about a recent New York Times article about his past financial struggles, which mentioned that he once spent $80,000 dollars on a "luxury speedboat."

Rubio has disputed that description and he turned it into a joke into before a Utah gathering hosted by Mitt Romney. "My wife and I have been blessed," Rubio deadpanned. "We've even been able to buy a luxury speedboat, cleverly disguised as a family fishing boat." The wisecrack won applause and laughter from the crowd.

"The latest attack by the New York Times and others," Rubio contended, "is that I'm not rich enough to be president."

That story—along with another article the Times ran several days earlier about traffic tickets accrued by Rubio and his wife—has been a boon to the senator's presidential bid, people close to him say. His campaign has been fundraising off the news pieces, and he even gained some sympathy from comedian Jon Stewart.

In Utah, the Floridian took a swipe at Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton over her own finances: "I do not have a family foundation that has raised $2 billion, some of it from foreign entities."

In a half-hour speech speech followed by a question-and-answer session, Rubio spoke of everything from the economy and domestic politics to foreign policy. He called Vladimir Putin "evil." And in a signature line, the 44-year-old lawmaker lamented that the United States remains "plagued by leaders who are trapped in the past."

The son of Cuban immigrants also reiterated his position to reform immigration sequentially, starting with tougher enforcement and bringing illegal immigration "under control." More broadly, he said his party cannot be seen as antagonistic toward Hispanics when asked about immigration and the Latino vote.

"When you think someone doesn't care about people like you it's hard to listen to anything else they're saying," he said. "So we have to confront that."

Rubio said Republicans should have a plan for the millions of Americans—including in his home state of Florida—who might lose health insurance subsidies if the Supreme Court invalidates that portion of President Barack Obama's signature health care law later this month. "I'm not sure we've arrived at a consensus yet," he said, stopping short of endorsing specific proposals for those affected. Republican leaders insist they're prepared to act.

A Senate colleague and presidential rival, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, talking to reporters at the Utah event, made a similar point. "We have an obligation as a party to not just complain but to work with the president if he'll work with us," Graham said. "What do you do with people with subsidies?

"I want to make sure there's a meaningful transition here so they're not left out in the cold," he added.

Everybody is flipping out over The New York Times' 'attacks' on Marco Rubio // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 12, 2015

The New York Times' scrutiny of Sen. Marco Rubio's (R-Florida) past is stirring up controversy on the presidential campaign trail.

Fox News and the conservative-leaning media have been covering the paper's stories on Rubio relentlessly. Other GOP presidential candidates have been pressed to weigh in. And Rubio himself appears to be milking the issue for all its worth.

Many of these conservatives criticized The Times for allegedly being too aggressive in two recent stories examining Rubio's record. One report last week revealed the traffic violations he and his wife received. Earlier this week, the other report documented his risky personal-finance decisions, including the purchase of three homes and an $80,000 boat while reportedly not having enough cash to balance the liabilities.

Fox's Sean Hannity devoted two segments of his Thursday night show to skewering the articles — with the full participation of Rubio's presidential campaign.

"We take these attacks very seriously — as we need to. Clearly, The New York Times has an agenda here," Rubio's communications director, Alex Conant, declared on the show.

Conant also fired off a press release on Tuesday slamming the "elitist" newspaper and arguing that the senator's finances are actually quite sound.

Hannity's other segment on the topic featured Robin Leach, the former host of "Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous," doing a dramatic reading of the second Times article in order to mock the idea that Rubio lives a luxurious life.

Of course, Republicans slamming The Times is nothing new. Its left-leaning editorial board and headquarters in heavily Democratic New York City have long made it a favorite target for GOP presidential candidates, some of whom have questionably claimed they don't even read the prominent paper.

However, the backlash over the Rubio articles has been notably intense. Former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pennsylvania), a rival presidential candidate, called the stories "petty." Storms of critics have blasted the newspaper on social media and right-leaning news outlets have run story after story questioning the reporting. Even "The Daily Show" host Jon Stewart, who leans left, torched the reports this week.

As many observers have noted, all the attention benefits Rubio's White House ambitions by rallying conservatives around his cause and advertising his relatively relatable background.

Rubio's campaign clearly agrees. His team has released multiple fundraising messages about The Times' stories and claimed earlier this week that they raised $100,000 in five days because of the reports. Two of the fundraising emails featured "#RubioCrimeSpree" in their subject lines in order to make fun of Rubio's four traffic violations since 1997.

Rubio himself signed an email Friday morning continuing to raise money off The Times.

"Like millions of Americans, I had to take out student loans to pay for college and law school, and only paid them off recently. But the biggest debt I have is to America," he wrote. "Look, I know these attacks are part of running for president, but the fact remains that we can't rely on the media to tell our campaign's story. And that's why I need your help."

For its part, The Times' Washington bureau chief, Carolyn Ryan, previously defended the paper's scrutiny of Rubio as part of how it approaches all presidential candidates.

"The vote for president is the most personal vote that Americans cast," she told The Washington Post after the traffic-ticket story. "Voters want to know about these candidates — not just as policy-makers, but as people. It is not at all unusual or unexpected for us to scrutinize candidates' backgrounds and their lives through public records."

PAUL

Rand Paul doesn't run with the herd // Politico // Kyle Cheney – June 12, 2015

It's practically a campaign-trail cliché: An Iowa interest group or deep-pocketed donor demands an audience of presidential contenders, and the candidates dutifully answer the call, flocking to assorted pig roasts or single-issue summits to test their messages and shake hands with potential supporters.

But not Rand Paul.

The Kentucky Republican was noticeably absent from last week's so-called Roast and Ride, a rollicking get-together hosted by Paul's colleague, Sen. Joni Ernst, in Iowa. He turned down an invitation to former Gov. Mitt Romney's gathering of presidential candidates in Utah this weekend in favor of a swing through Southern California. He skipped last month's Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Oklahoma City (and his PATRIOT Act filibuster kept several other senators from attending as well). Earlier this year, he also took a pass on a prominent Iowa agriculture summit and a gathering of White House wannabes hosted by Iowa Rep. Steve King.

While Paul's rivals for the Republican nomination have ricocheted from one high-profile Iowa gathering to the next, Paul's been mounting a quieter series of solo events, skipping the impersonal cattle calls to burnish his image as a man untethered from conventional campaigning.

To his critics, it's a risky strategy that could turn off activists he'll need in January.

"Sen. Paul needs to do something his dad never could, and that's grow his base of support," said Tim Albrecht, a Republican strategist and former aide to Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad, referencing former Texas Rep. Ron Paul's three presidential bids. "Ignoring traditional Republicans is not a particularly effective tactic in Iowa, and if he hopes to be successful here, he's got to engage the grass roots beyond his father's loyal sycophants."

But Paul's campaign is emphatic: Paul's not against cattle calls — he attended New Hampshire's First in the Nation Summit in April and is still considering attending the Family Leader's July 18 summit in Iowa — but the less he shares a stage with his rivals, the more it bolsters his image as an atypical Republican who's ready to engage segments of the GOP electorate that have long been overlooked.

"While some candidates are limited to group-style events, Sen. Paul is able to engage communities outside of traditional Republican comfort zones," said campaign spokesman Sergio Gor. "He's in early states on a weekly basis, but he's also working on expanding the GOP by showing up in places like UC Berkeley, Detroit and Silicon Valley."

To some operatives, Paul's decision to skip big gatherings suggests he's posturing like a front-runner. "Candidates that consider themselves as front-runners often do that because they don't want to share the stage with candidates of a lesser stature," said one veteran New Hampshire operative. "In a state like Iowa — Iowa has a lot of cattle calls. In a state like New Hampshire, we don't have many … It's always good to make your own news but at the same time, you need to pay respect to the activists."

In fact, during Ernst's event, Paul was traveling in New Hampshire, a three-day swing that followed his efforts in the Senate to block the reauthorization of the PATRIOT Act. But much of his travel has taken him to states that play a minimal role in selecting the Republican nominee.

While his opponents have congregated at large events, Paul has opted to parachute into often-ignored communities like Irvine, California, and Windsor Mill, Maryland, where Republican audiences are unaccustomed to the presidential campaign treatment.

Paul hinted at his calculus on Tuesday, when he addressed the Baltimore County Republican Party — a group that readily admitted being overlooked by other Republican candidates. "You showed me you can win in Maryland," Paul said, referencing last year's election of Republican Gov. Larry Hogan. "I think we can win across the country when we become a bigger, more diverse, more inclusive party."

His gesture was clearly reciprocated by an enthusiastic crowd. "He's showing up in places where the Republican Party, let's be honest, we haven't done a very good job," said Dan Bongino, who introduced Paul at the event.

It's not that Paul isn't deeply aware of the importance of the early states — in fact he may need strong finishes in Iowa and New Hampshire to justify a continued campaign. But appealing to Republicans in blue states and forgotten corners is about a larger strategy of proving his electability in the general election, supporters say, a trait that could influence Iowans.

Steve Sukup, a prominent Iowa supporter of Paul, guessed that a third of Iowa voters will pick a candidate based on electability. "For the third of the Republicans that want somebody who can win in November '16, showing that you're willing to get the independent votes and a portion of the swing Democrats — he could do well," Sukup said.

Sukup said the senator has made up for skipping the big Republican cattle calls with a frenetic schedule of solo events, like an appearance in Davenport with Sen. Chuck Grassley earlier this month.

"The philosophy is to target your audiences, and ones that want to come hear you, those are the ones who you want to solidify for the caucus," he said. "I think he has a very specific message, and I think it's going to resonate with enough Iowans that he can bring them to his events instead of doing the mix and match."

Even Paul's critics aren't sure his unorthodox campaign hurts him among Iowans. "Sen. Paul is one of the most interesting creatures in the world," said Joni Scotter, a Republican activist who said she won't be with Paul in the primary but would support him in a general election. "Iowa's so used to him doing that. But his supporters are the ones that count. They go along with that 100 percent. I think they find it quite intriguing."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scotter said she suspected Paul skipped the Ernst event because it would've been awkward to come face to face with her so soon after he riled his Senate colleagues by blocking their version of a PATRIOT Act reauthorization.

For now, Paul's unusual schedule doesn't appear to be costing him. He still clocks in near the top of the polls in Iowa and New Hampshire. He's got a built-in base of libertarian-tinged support loyal to his father and has spent much of his time trying to reach young minority voters who he's argued have largely been poorly served by Democrats and overlooked by Republicans.

But the early-state power brokers are watching. Branstad, through a spokesman, hinted that candidates who eschew prominent gatherings in his state do so at their own peril.

"When meeting with candidates, the governor and [lieutenant] governor encourage them to attend as many of the major Iowa gatherings as possible," said Branstad spokesman Jimmy Centers. "We've seen from events like the Republican Party of Iowa's Lincoln Dinner or U.S. Sen. Joni Ernst's Roast and Ride that these gatherings afford candidates the opportunity to meet with hundreds of Iowans in one place."

Rand Paul returns to California's conservative corridors to court donors // LA Times // Kurtis Lee – June 12, 2015

Often, presidential candidates venture to California for a single purpose: to raise campaign cash.

Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky is no exception. He traveled immediately in the days after his April campaign kickoff to a state that serves primarily as the ATM for national political campaigns, and he returned Friday both for fundraisers and to deliver the keynote address at an annual gathering of Orange County Republicans in Irvine.

He then travels to San Diego on Saturday to speak at a Lincoln Day Dinner.

"He's the kind of person whose message resonates with the entire state," Eric Beach, Paul's campaign finance chairman, told The Times in April.

Both stops this weekend are set before friendly audiences in some of the most conservative parts of the state and will give Paul opportunities to try to attract more donors.

Erik Weigand, executive director of the Orange County Republican Party, said Friday's event will be attended by state and federal GOP lawmakers, such as Reps. Darrell Issa of Vista and Mimi Walters of Laguna Niguel.

"We reached out several months ago to all of the likely presidential candidates and Sen. Paul got back to us right away," Weigand said. "I think it shows his interest in Orange County and Republicans across the state."

Paul, who has tapped himself as a "different kind of Republican," has also forged into California's Democratic strongholds more than any of the nearly dozen GOP presidential hopefuls.

In the past year, he's delivered a speech at UC Berkeley and held discussions in Silicon Valley with executives from Facebook and eBay. Last month he opened an office in San Francisco in an effort to tap into the tech field and court donors who might find appeal in his libertarian leanings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a California centric op-ed essay Paul wrote in the Washington Times two years ago, he argued that for his party to have success it must "broaden and sharpen" its message so that it "can compete everywhere, every time, for every vote — coast to coast."

"Republicans reaching out to new audiences doesn't mean being less conservative, but applying libertarian and constitutional principles where they are sorely needed on multiple issues," wrote Paul.

Paul has himself looked to appeal to a wider base of voters. He's visited inner cities and college campuses, talking about issues such as reducing penalties for drug use and policing practices as he courts young and minority voters.

WALKER

Scott Walker and the Fate of the Union // NYT // Dan Kaufman – June 12, 2015

On his first day of work in three months, Randy Bryce asked his foreman for the next day off. He wanted to go to the Capitol in Madison, Wis., and testify against a proposed law. Bryce, a member of Milwaukee Ironworkers Local 8, was unloading truckloads of steel beams to build a warehouse near Kenosha, and he needed the job. He has an 8-year-old son, his debts were piling up and a 10-hour shift paid more than $300. But the legislation, which Republicans were rushing through the State Senate, angered him enough to sacrifice the hours. Supporters called it a "right to work" bill, because it prohibited unions from requiring employees to pay dues. But to Bryce, that appealing name hid the true purpose of the bill, which was to destroy unions.

The next morning, Bryce, who is 50 and has close-cropped black hair and a horseshoe mustache, woke up at 5:30, got dressed in his usual jeans, hoodie and Local 8 varsity jacket with an I-beam and an American flag stitched on the back and drove 90 miles to Madison in his gray Mustang. Despite the February chill, crowds had begun to gather in the square outside the Capitol. The scene was reminiscent of a similar one that played out four years earlier, in 2011, when thousands of people occupied the Capitol's rotunda for more than two weeks to protest Act 10, a law that demolished collective-bargaining rights for nearly all public employees. The protests in Madison were the first significant resistance to the ascendant Tea Party and helped set the stage for Occupy Wall Street. For Wisconsin's governor, Scott Walker, it was the moment that started his conservative ascent. "The Republican Party has a demonstrated, genuine hero and potential star in its ranks, and he is the governor of Wisconsin," Rush Limbaugh said last year. The unions, Democrats and other perceived enemies, he continued, had "thrown everything they've got at Scott Walker, and he has beat them back without one syllable of complaint, without one ounce of whining. All he has done is win." Walker is expected to announce in the next few weeks that he is entering the 2016 presidential race.

It is particularly bitter for Walker's opponents that his rise has taken place in Wisconsin, a blue state with a long history of labor activism; it was the first state in the nation to grant collective-bargaining rights to public employees, in 1959. Walker, who declined to be interviewed for this article, has won three races for governor, one a recall effort, and each time he took more than a third of the votes from union households. He was able to do this by making "labor" seem like someone else — even to union members — and pitting one faction against another. Four years ago, in a private exchange captured by a documentary filmmaker, he revealed his successful strategy to a billionaire supporter who asked him if Wisconsin would ever become a right-to-work state. Walker responded enthusiastically, explaining that Act 10 was just the beginning of a larger effort. "The first step is, we're going to deal with collective bargaining for all public-employee unions," he said, "because you use divide-and-conquer."

At the Capitol, dozens of state troopers (who kept their bargaining rights) and Capitol police officers (who lost theirs) were now patrolling the rotunda to prevent it from being occupied again. The Senate hearing room was already packed, so Bryce watched the hearing on monitors outside while he waited for his turn to speak. First came the expert witnesses. James Sherk, an economist at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said that unions operate as cartels: "They try to control the supply of labor in an industry so as to drive up its price, namely wages.

But like all cartels, these gains come at the cost of greater losses to the rest of society." Greg Mourad, a spokesman for a lobbying organization called the National Right to Work Committee, which has received significant funding from the conservative billionaire Koch brothers, compared the experience of being made to pay union dues to being kidnapped and extorted. Gordon Lafer, a political scientist at the University of Oregon, noted on the other hand that while right-to-work laws in other states had generated no identifiable economic gains, they did drive down wages for union and nonunion workers alike.

Ordinary citizens got their chance to speak in the afternoon. Nearly all of them opposed the bill. A crane operator cited statistics showing that workers in right-to-work states are killed on the job more frequently. "Are you prepared to be accountable for the deaths that being a right-to-work state can create?" he asked. Anthony Anastasi, the president of Ironworkers Local 383, broke down in tears as he pleaded to the legislators, "Please think about the families that will be impacted by this."

At 6 p.m., Bryce's name finally appeared on the list of coming speakers. He paced the hallway outside the hearing room in anticipation. But 20 minutes later, Stephen Nass, the Republican senator who is the chairman of the Labor and Government Reform Committee, announced that there was a "credible threat of disruption" and that the hearing would be adjourned so the committee could vote to move the bill forward (it passed). A labor organizer, it turned out, had told The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel that some people planned to stand up in protest at 7 p.m., when testimony was to be cut off. ("I went through Act 10 — it was ugly," Nass said earlier in the hearing, referring to the difficulty some senators experienced reaching various parts of the Capitol after the rotunda was occupied. "We had to go through a tunnel like rats. We don't want to go through that again.") About a hundred people were still in line to testify. A chant of "Let us speak" erupted. But Nass quickly took the committee members' votes and was then escorted out, with his two Republican colleagues, by a phalanx of state troopers.

Bryce still wanted to speak. He had lost a day's wages, and the committee's two Democratic senators had remained to hear more testimony. State troopers were now blocking the door to the hearing room, though, so he decided to address a group of protesters in the hallway outside instead.

"My name is Randy Bryce," he began in a loud voice. "I've been a member of Ironworkers Local 8 since 1997. I've had the privilege in that time to work on many of Wisconsin's landmarks, private businesses and numerous other parts of our infrastructure." As he spoke, the protesters began to quiet. Bryce described how he had wandered from job to job after he left the Army, how Local 8's apprenticeship program had given him direction, a real career. Finally, he presented the case against what he called "a blatant political attack" on his union. "All of our representatives are elected," he said. "All of the decisions that we make are voted on. The general membership is given monthly reports on how every dime is spent. Every dime spent is voted on. Unlike what is taking place this week, Ironworkers Local 8 is pure democracy. I am disappointed beyond words at not just what this bill contains, but how it is being passed."

Two days later, just after the full Senate approved the bill that would make Wisconsin the 25th right-to-work state, Scott Walker was in Maryland, attending the Conservative Political Action Conference, the annual showcase for conservative activists and Republican presidential hopefuls. At a question-and-answer session, one attendee asked Walker how he, as president, would confront the threat from radical Islamist groups like ISIS. Walker's answer was simple, and may in the end define his candidacy. "If I can take on 100,000 protesters," he said, "I can do the same across the world."

At the foot of a hill in Bay View, a quiet Milwaukee neighborhood near Lake Michigan, stand seven pear trees. In front of them is a small wooden plaque that recounts the events of May 5, 1886, when some 1,500 workers, most of them Polish immigrants, marched on the Rolling Mills iron plant. The Milwaukee Iron Company built the plant and the neighborhood where its employees lived, and it demanded in return that they work as many as 16 hours a day, six days a week. A citywide strike for an eight-hour day and better working conditions had shut down every large factory in Milwaukee except Rolling Mills, and as the marchers began climbing the hill toward this last holdout, members of the Wisconsin National Guard fired down on them. They killed seven people, including a 13-year-old boy. Jeremiah Rusk, the governor of Wisconsin, had given the order. "I seen my duty, and I done it," he later said. At the time he thought he might become president, but in the end he never ran. Until 1986, when the Wisconsin Labor History Society began holding an annual commemoration, the Bay View Massacre was largely forgotten. In 1996, the society planted the pear trees, one for each person killed.

Many of the great labor battles that followed the Bay View Massacre — Pittsburgh's Homestead Strike of 1892; Colorado's Ludlow Massacre of 1914 — also ended in violent defeat for the workers. Yet the defeats, in their very brutality, also forged a sense of solidarity that eventually produced great labor victories, including the eight-hour workday, enshrined into federal law during the Depression, and the passage of the 1935 Wagner Act, which guaranteed the right to strike and remains labor's greatest means of leverage. That same year, the American Federation of Labor fully chartered A. Philip Randolph's Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, a black union. From 1935 to 1947, union membership in the United States quadrupled, from 3.5 million workers to nearly 15 million workers, fueled by the pro-union policies of the New Deal and a labor shortage during World War II. By the mid-'50s, more than a third of American workers belonged to a union.

In 1941, when the movement was still ascending, William Ruggles, a 40-year-old editorial writer for The Dallas Morning News, coined the slogan "right to work." Ruggles was alarmed by the growing strength of the labor movement, which in his view was intent on forcing all workers into unions. He proposed a constitutional amendment that would prohibit workers from having to pay dues to a union in order to hold a job in a "union shop." "If the country does not want it, let us say so," he wrote. "If we do want it, adopt it and maintain forever the right to work of every American."

The day after the editorial was printed, a Houston political activist named Vance Muse called Ruggles to ask permission for his organization, the Christian American Association, to pursue the proposal. Ruggles agreed and suggested to Muse that he call it a "Right to Work Amendment." Muse, an avowed racist — he told a United States Senate committee in 1936, "I am a Southerner and for white supremacy" — held a special animus toward unions, which he believed fostered race-mixing. In "Southern Exposure," a 1946 book about racism in the South, the muckraking journalist Stetson Kennedy quoted Muse's pitch on the need for right-to-work, in which he said: "White women and white men will be forced into organizations with black African apes, whom they will have to call 'brother' or lose their jobs."

But Muse was also an effective fund-raiser — he received support from General Motors and the du Pont family, among others — and lobbyist. In 1944, the Christian American Association sponsored the amendment that made Arkansas one of the country's first right-to-work states. By 1947, 10 more states, most of them in the South, had become right-to-work, embodying the growing national backlash against labor brought on by the Red Scare. That same year, over President Harry Truman's veto, Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act, which undercut the Wagner Act by placing numerous restrictions on unions, among them a clause granting states the power to become right-to-work. Muse died in 1950, but his campaign had already been taken over by more mainstream proponents. In 1955, Fred Hartley, the former congressman from New Jersey who helped draft Taft-Hartley, founded the National Right to Work Committee. Three years later, Kansas legislators, with the enthusiastic support of the oil magnate Fred Koch, David and Charles Koch's father, adopted a right-to-work amendment. By 1963, 19 states were right-to-work. Since then, six more have adopted the measure, including, in the past three years, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin.

As state legislatures chipped away at unions, other forces were also at work. Some union bosses turned corrupt. Manufacturers began pursuing cheaper labor overseas. Automated systems replaced skilled workers in industry after industry. And some politicians saw a chance to show that they were not beholden to "special interests."

In the fall of 1980, Ronald Reagan, then a Republican presidential candidate, sent a letter to Robert Poli, the president of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, seeking the endorsement of the union, many of whose members were military veterans and socially conservative. "You can rest assured," Reagan wrote, "that if I am elected president, I will take whatever steps are necessary to provide our air traffic controllers with the most modern equipment available and to adjust staff levels and workdays so that they are commensurate with achieving a maximum degree of public safety." The union gave Reagan its endorsement.

Eight months later, after contract negotiations with the Federal Aviation Administration failed, the members of the union voted to strike, violating an oath signed by federal employees. Reagan was unsympathetic. After 48 hours, he invoked a provision of Taft-Hartley and not only fired more than 11,000 air traffic controllers, but also had them permanently replaced. The union's strike fund was frozen, many of its local leaders were imprisoned and, until 1993, the former strikers were banned from the Civil Service. Since Reagan broke that union, the number of large-scale strikes begun in a given year in the United States has fallen to 11 (last year) from 145 (in 1981). In 2014, only 11 percent of all American workers and 7 percent of private-sector workers belonged to a

The night before Walker announced his plans for Act 10 to the public, he gathered his cabinet in the governor's mansion for a private dinner and a pep talk. During the dinner, Walker stood up and held aloft a picture of Reagan. He singled out the firing of the air traffic controllers as "one of the most defining moments" of Reagan's political career — a moment, he said, that "was the first crack in the Berlin Wall."

Randy Bryce wasn't always a labor activist. He grew up in Milwaukee's "policeman's ghetto," a working-class neighborhood on the city's southwestern edge. His father was a beat cop, his mother a doctor's secretary. In 1983, Bryce enlisted in the Army so he could pay for college and was stationed for a year at Soto Cano air base in Honduras, then a launching point for American covert operations in Nicaragua and El Salvador. "My dad was conservative," Bryce said. "When I was in the Army, I was, too. I was into Reagan, but it was more America first, U.S.A., U.S.A."

After his discharge, Bryce briefly attended the University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee, but was found to have testicular cancer and dropped out to receive treatment. He lucked into an experimental trial at a medical college that cured him and eventually landed a job assisting homeless veterans. "I remember talking to a vet," he said. "He was an atomic warrior in the Cold War, and he showed me his back. It looked like someone poured acid on it." The government wouldn't help the man, Bryce said, because he was unable to prove that the injury was caused by exposure to an atomic test. "It couldn't have been made more clear to me that vets were disposable resources," he said. Bryce heard about Local 8's apprenticeship program from a patient in his mother's office. After completing his four-year ironworker's apprenticeship, he became more involved in the union. Since Act 10 passed in 2011, he has run unsuccessfully for State Senate and State Assembly and now serves as Local 8's political coordinator. After protesting the passage of right-to-work laws in Indiana and Michigan, Bryce began a grass-roots organizing campaign against the bill in Wisconsin.

In southeastern Wisconsin, union ironworkers earn $55 an hour and receive $33 of that in pretax income. (The difference goes to funding their pensions, health care and training.) The pretax pay for a unionized ironworker in Iowa, a right-to-work state since 1947, tops out at $26 an hour. In Texas, also a right-to-work state since 1947, the sole ironworkers' local offers pretax wages of $18 an hour. Nonunion workers in the state doing the same job make about $8 an hour. "A mile of U.S. highway in Texas costs close to the same as it does in Wisconsin, certainly not less than half," Colin Millard, an organizer for the Iron Workers International Union, told me. "So it is only a question of who makes the money — the workers or the owners."

Ironwork is a dangerous job. It has the sixth-highest fatality rate in the country, according to a Bloomberg News analysis of Bureau of Labor Statistics data. A 2011 University of Michigan study concluded that the fatality rate in construction trades was 40 percent higher in right-to-work states. Local 8 offers a four-year training program that requires more than 7,000 hours of combined classroom and on-the-job study. Even many right-to-work proponents single out the building trades' training programs, like Local 8's, as exemplary.

That is one reason many Wisconsin business owners, who might be expected to cheer the demise of unions and welcome cheaper labor costs, have not done so. Contractors rely on the unions to certify and drug-test workers and keep their workers current on new technologies and job skills. Collectively, Wisconsin's trade unions contributed more than $30 million last year to training programs.

Bill Kennedy, the president of Rock Road Companies, a family-owned asphalt-paving operation with headquarters in Janesville, Wis., flew back early from a Florida business trip to testify against the right-to-work bill at the same Senate hearing where Bryce tried to speak. Kennedy also helps run the Wisconsin Contractors Coalition, an organization of business owners whose positions on labor issues counter those of Wisconsin Manufacturers & Commerce, the most powerful statewide business lobby, which has pushed hard for right-to-work. Within a few months of its founding in 2014, Kennedy's coalition attracted nearly 450 like-minded businesses that collectively employ some 120,000 people. Like many of the group's members, Kennedy voted for Walker and contributed to each of his campaigns.

“There’s this misguided myth that unions and management don’t get along,” Kennedy told me the day after the hearing. Rock Road was founded in 1913 by Kennedy’s grandfather. It was a hauling business until the Depression, when it began bidding on government-funded projects like railroad beds and town roads. At its summertime peak, Kennedy’s company employs about 150 workers. His opposition to right-to-work is rooted in pragmatism. “It’s a business bottom-line issue,” he said. “Right-to-work is going to compromise my quality, my competitiveness. The unions are my partner. They’re almost like a screening agency.” Kennedy’s greatest fear is that right-to-work will undermine the unions’ contribution, and eventually the quality and skills of his employees. “This is a working system,” he said. “I have never understood this right-to-work agenda.”

Even when he was attacking public unions for robbing the taxpayers of Wisconsin, Walker consistently praised private-sector unions, particularly those in the construction trades, calling them “my partners in economic development.” During his first term, many of those unions, including Local 8, backed Walker’s effort to rewrite the state’s environmental law so that an enormous iron-ore mine could be built in a pristine section of northern Wisconsin, a few miles from a Chippewa Indian reservation. The mine, which was never built, was fiercely opposed by Native American tribes and conservationists, but the mining company promised to deliver hundreds of union jobs, creating a split in Walker’s broad-based opposition.

In 2010, Terry McGowan, the president of Local 139, a statewide union of 9,000 heavy-machinery operators, endorsed Walker, because he had promised to increase highway funding and build more roads. McGowan supported him again last year, but since then, he has come to reconsider. Testifying at a right-to-work State Assembly hearing in February, McGowan’s voice cracked as he described the death, three days earlier, of Ryan Calkins, a 33-year-old union operating engineer who got caught in a drilling rig while working on a highway interchange in Milwaukee. “Remember that name — Ryan Calkins — because he will just be a little blurb in the newspaper,” McGowan told the legislators. Five hours after Calkins was killed, McGowan said, he received a call from a lawyer for Calkins’s employer; it needed someone who knew how to operate the specialized drill to help remove the mutilated body. McGowan sent one of his union members, who had trained at Local 139’s facility in central Wisconsin. “Now we’re talking about possibly taking training and safety away from our industry?” McGowan asked in disbelief.

A few days after McGowan testified, I went to see him at Local 139’s impressive new glass-and-steel union hall in wealthy suburban Waukesha County, a stronghold of support for Walker. McGowan greeted me warmly, but I could see he was still shaken by Calkins’s death. “I gained a lot of respect for the guy that I called, because he made it very obvious he didn’t want to do it,” McGowan said. “But he said he was not going to allow a fellow operating engineer to sit wrapped around that drill bit in that weather and freeze solid. You could hear his family in the background. I’m sure he was looking at his wife and kids while I was talking to him.”

In his testimony, McGowan described his members as “beer-drinking, gun-toting, pickup-driving rednecks” and reminded legislators that many of his workers are politically conservative and usually vote Republican. Local 139’s special relationship to Republican politicians was made clear when Scott Fitzgerald, the State Senate majority leader and the sponsor of the right-to-work bill, floated the idea of exempting McGowan’s union, along with a few others.

“One side of the aisle likes the work we do, but not our organization, while the other side likes our organization, but not what we do,” McGowan told me. He had lobbied heavily on behalf of the iron-ore mine. “I was surprised that the United Steelworkers fought the mine so hard, when the mine would have used their equipment. The mine became political, and a lot of the unions that opposed it; they did it so that Walker couldn’t get a victory out of it. My thinking was: jobs.”

Fidgeting behind his desk, McGowan rubbed his bald scalp and half-smiled. “I sort of trusted the guy,” he said, recalling his 2010 endorsement of Walker. “I took some bullets at the time from the other unions.” When Walker’s “divide and conquer” video was released in 2012, The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel asked McGowan about the governor’s remarks. McGowan told the paper that the phrase “divide and conquer” troubled him. “It means turning worker against worker,” he said.

Last fall, McGowan met with Walker, who was seeking a contribution and another endorsement for governor, at a small campaign office in Wauwatosa, outside Milwaukee. “I looked across the table at him, and I said, ‘We are both God-fearing men,' " McGowan told me. " 'If you can tell me that right-to-work will not come on your desk, then I will take you for your word.' He looked me in the eyes, and he said, 'It will not make it to my desk.' He was looking for a contribution, and I was looking for a commitment. We both got what we came for. He kept his, and I lost mine."

In 1956, the Republican Party platform declared: "The protection of the right of workers to organize into unions and to bargain collectively is the firm and permanent policy of the Eisenhower administration." President Richard Nixon enthusiastically courted the white "hard-hat vote," winning a majority of union households in the 1972 election. During a news conference announcing the replacement of the air traffic controllers, Reagan boasted of his union bona fides as a lifelong member of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. who led the Screen Actors Guild in its first-ever strike. Walker's own consistent praise for private unions appears, with the passage of right-to-work, to have come to an end, and with it any sense that his party must even pretend to support labor.

Many union leaders worry that if Walker is elected president, Congress could pass a national right-to-work bill. In January, Representative Steve King, Republican of Iowa, introduced such a bill in the House; it now has 98 co--sponsors. In February, Senator Rand Paul, Republican of Kentucky, sponsored a similar bill, which now has co--sponsors in Mitch McConnell, the majority leader, and 15 other Republicans.

In this sense, passing Act 10 was a kind of audition for Walker. "If we can do it in Wisconsin, we can do it anywhere — even in our nation's capital," he wrote in his 2013 book, "Unintimidated." The origins of Wisconsin's right-to-work bill, meanwhile, showed whom he might have been trying to impress. As revealed by the Center for Media and Democracy, a watchdog organization based in Madison, Wisconsin's law was a virtual copy of a 1995 model bill promoted by the American Legislative Exchange Council, an organization based in Arlington, Va., that disseminates model legislation for a consortium of corporations and conservative private backers, including the Koch brothers.

A law with language that closely tracks that model bill was enacted in Michigan in 2012. Similarly worded proposals were introduced this year in Kentucky, Maine, New Hampshire, New Mexico and West Virginia, but they failed to advance. Missouri's right-to-work bill, which was also more or less identical to the model bill, passed both houses this year, only to be vetoed by Gov. Jay Nixon, a Democrat, early this month. A few weeks after signing the right-to-work bill, Walker gave a private talk in New York to a group of powerful Republican donors that included David Koch. Koch later told reporters that he believes that Walker will be the eventual Republican presidential nominee. "I thought he had a great message," Koch said after the meeting to a reporter for The New York Observer. "Scott Walker is a tremendous candidate."

But if Wisconsin is a model for what Walker might achieve nationally, it is worth examining his results so far. Walker credits Act 10 in part for the decline in Wisconsin's unemployment rate since he took office in 2011 and has said he considers right-to-work "one more arrow in that quiver" for the creation of jobs. But since 2011, the state has fallen to 40th out of the 50 states in job growth and 42nd in wage growth, according to an analysis of Bureau of Labor Statistics dataconducted by The Capital Times of Wisconsin. Act 10, officially called the Wisconsin Budget Repair Bill, was supposed to fix persistent budget shortfalls by lowering labor costs and eliminating union rules. But Wisconsin's two-year projected budget deficit has actually increased; in May, the Legislature approved a $250 million cut to the state's prized university system to help close the gap. Wisconsin is now among the top 10 states people move out of.

Right-to-work bills like Walker's have also had negative consequences. When Michigan implemented a similar law in 2013, 16.3 percent of its workers belonged to a union; within a year, the percentage dropped to 14.5. That may not seem like a precipitous decline, but the loss erodes the collective-bargaining power of the unions and will almost certainly be reflected in lower wages across the board, as it has been in other states that have passed similar laws. In a New York Times Op-Ed article, Lawrence Mishel, the president of the left-leaning Economic Policy Institute, called the decline of union bargaining power in the United States "the single largest factor suppressing wage growth for middle-wage workers over the last few decades." And a recent study by two economists for the International Monetary Fund connected the decline in union membership in advanced economies to the overall rise of income inequality. It is not just pushing down the wages of the working class, they wrote; it is also increasing the incomes of the wealthiest 10 percent.

Wisconsin legislators are now considering repealing the state's prevailing-wage law, a Depression-era law requiring public construction projects to pay the going wage in a given area as determined by a survey of local employers. In places with high union membership, the union wage becomes the standard, which then raises the scale for nonunion workers. Like right-to-work, the prevailing-wage bill is being promoted by the American Legislative Exchange Council in states across the country; measures rolling it back recently passed in West Virginia and Nevada. Walker has said that repealing the prevailing-wage law is not "a priority" — a phrase he also used about the right-to-work bill — but in May, he promised to sign such a bill if it reached his desk.

In early March, I visited Dave Poklinkoski, the president of Local 2304, an electricians' union, at his office in Madison, where he was drawing up a right-to-work-compliant union contract. "Divide and conquer, it works," Poklinkoski said. "It works real well." He dug out his iPad from under a pile of papers and pulled up an editorial cartoon by Mike Konopacki that showed a bloodied Terry McGowan, the Local 139 president, with a sword in his back, the hilt and handle in the shape of Walker's head, labeled "R-T-W."

It didn't matter if everyone knew that Walker had broken a promise to a union leader, because now it was clear, at least in Wisconsin, that Walker no longer needed labor. "Wisconsin has become a kind of laboratory for oligarchs to implement their political and economic agenda," Poklinkoski said. "We're small enough that they can carry it out. Can they carry it out on the national level? We'll find out."

Two weeks after Walker signed the right-to-work bill, Local 8 held a monthly meeting in its union hall just outside Milwaukee. On the way there, I drove past Miller Park, the Milwaukee Brewers' stadium, which Bryce worked on in 2000, during the final phase of its construction. It was the project he was most proud of. From the Interstate, I could see the elaborate arched ironwork crowning the stadium's top. It reminded me of a photograph I had glimpsed on the wall of Bryce's home showing him and two other ironworkers decking the top of the stadium. They looked tiny in the far distance, but you could tell how strong the wind was from the way a tarp was blowing.

Bryce's grandfather, Eugene, had taken the photo. He used to drive by the stadium several times a week, because he loved watching Bryce work. It was difficult to see Bryce and his co-workers, 350 feet in the air and bracing against the wind, as members of a cartel, as the Heritage Foundation economist had described unions in his Senate testimony. Miller Park had claimed the lives of three Local 8 ironworkers, who fell 300 feet to their deaths when a giant crane collapsed into the stadium on a fiercely windy day.

Bryce arrived at the Local 8 meeting straight from work, wearing mud-caked overalls. He walked into the office to pay his $53 in monthly dues and then chatted with a few other ironworkers before wandering into the meeting hall. After the men recited the Pledge of Allegiance and the recording secretary read the minutes from the previous month's meeting, the executive board began a series of briefings: the prospects for building a new arena for the Milwaukee Bucks, the restructuring of the local's dental plans, what happened at the annual conference of the international union in Las Vegas.

Last on the agenda was Bryce's political report. He stood up and started talking. He told the union workers about being locked out of the Senate hearing. He told them about the next day, when he went back to protest and was thrown out of the Senate debate for shouting, "This bill is turning Wisconsin into a banana republic." He talked about his organizing trips in anticipation of right-to-work and the dispiritingly small crowds at the rallies. He implored Local 8's members to become more active and not to think of themselves as elite tradesmen whose concerns were distinct from those of other workers and other movements. "Unions are not separate from the community," he said. "We build the community. Yet you're seen as the enemy, the reason people are broke. We have to stop this union-versus-nonunion mentality."

After the meeting, Bryce headed out to the parking lot. There had been some defeats, he acknowledged, but he still saw the attacks on unions as an opportunity to build solidarity. "At last month's meeting, I talked about how the only way to fight back is to stage a massive general strike," he said. "It doesn't need to be that, but we do need to build ourselves up to a strength where theyfear that. Now they're not afraid of anything, because we haven't done anything to fight back."

Bryce blamed the timidity of both union leaders and the rank-and-file, as much as the Republicans, for allowing Act 10 and right-to-work to become law. “People think that unions are useless today, that we’re dinosaurs,” he said. “Well, how did that happen? We let it happen. The labor movement has become lazy, because it’s something that’s been handed to us.” He leaned against his Mustang and stared out into the industrial landscape surrounding the parking lot.

“A lot of guys in our local didn’t see Act 10 as being important for ironworkers,” Bryce said, because it targeted public employees. “I would ask them, how can you say there are good unions and bad unions? It’s an idea that they’re trying to kill — it’s not the union itself. This is the strategy they’re using to do it. They’re splitting everything up. They’re going after them first, then it’s going to be somebody else. Then they’re going to get to us too.”

It came out of nowhere: an open letter from Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker declaring his support for a ban on abortions once pregnancies reach 20 weeks.

The missive delighted antiabortion activists in the state — and set off a scramble in the State Capitol here because no such legislation had actually been introduced.

The restrictions, approved this week by the state Senate and likely to be passed by the Republican-dominated state Assembly, underscore the extent to which Walker — who has not yet announced his candidacy — is positioning himself to be the most fervent antiabortion candidate in the Republican field of presidential hopefuls.

The stance could help Walker win votes in conservative early-voting states, especially those with large numbers of evangelical Christian voters. But others are competing for those voters as well, including his main rivals of the moment, former Florida governor Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.).

Walker is opposed to abortion in all cases — including when a pregnancy is the result of rape or incest — and he has received near-perfect ratings from antiabortion activist groups. As governor, Walker forced five health-care centers to close after stripping Planned Parenthood of funding, and he signed a law that required ultrasounds for women before they have an abortion.

Proponents of abortion rights have declared Walker’s record on the issue one of the most “dangerous” and “extreme” they have seen.

But Walker has an unexpected problem: Despite his record, he seemed to soften his rhetoric on abortion during his run for reelection last year, raising suspicions among some antiabortion activists that he wasn’t necessarily with them.

“I take him at his word, but it’s even more compelling to take him at his word when it’s coupled with action in his state,” said Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List, a national group opposed to abortion.

Dannenfelser said that for the past year she has pressured potential 2016 contenders to publicly support a ban on abortions after 20 weeks, and shetracks their positions on her group’s Web site. Former Texas governor Rick Perry (R) signed a 20-week abortion ban into law in 2013, while Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) introduced federal legislation that attracted statements of support from Bush, Rubio and five other Republicans who are declared or likely 2016 candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Earlier this year, Dannenfelser criticized Walker for not joining in. In early March, Walker issued the “open letter on life” posted on the Susan B. Anthony List’s Web site; the declaration came two days after he struggled to answer questions about his abortion positions clearly on “Fox News Sunday.”

“I will sign that bill when it gets to my desk and support similar legislation on the federal level,” Walker wrote in the letter. “I was raised to believe in the sanctity of life and I will always fight to protect it.”

As written, the Wisconsin legislation would ban abortions after 20 weeks unless a “medical emergency” occurred. Doctors who performed abortions after that point could be charged with a felony, facing up to $10,000 in fines or 31/2 years in prison. The parents, including the father, could also sue for damages. There are no exceptions for pregnancies resulting from rape or incest.

Walker told local reporters last week that he would sign the legislation into law with or without that exception.

“I think for most people who are concerned about that, it’s in the initial months where they’re most concerned about it,” Walker said of pregnancies related to rape and incest.

That comment quickly prompted criticism.

“Really?” said state Sen. Lena C. Taylor, a Democrat from Milwaukee. “How does he know what goes on in the minds of pregnant women who have been raped or who have experienced incest, who are survivors? How does he know?”

Democrats have also criticized Walker for defending his state’s mandated ultrasounds by gushing about seeing his son’s first ultrasounds years ago. “It’s just a cool thing out there,” he said of such photos.

As a young lawmaker in the Wisconsin Assembly in the 1990s, Walker helped write and pass legislation that requires women seeking an abortion to wait 24 hours and that bans a seldom-used procedure known by opponents as “partial-birth abortion.” Walker unsuccessfully tried three times to pass legislation that would protect doctors, pharmacists and other health-care workers who refuse to engage in procedures that conflict with their religious beliefs, including performing an abortion, using stem cells or dispensing some birth-control drugs. He also tried unsuccessfully to require minors to obtain parental consent before having an abortion.

In campaign-style appearances in Iowa and South Carolina, Walker has bragged about stripping Planned Parenthood of state funding while governor. Planned Parenthood officials say the funding went to non-abortion services such as cancer screenings and providing birth control and that the cut forced them to close five health centers in rural areas that do not perform abortions.

When Walker ran for reelection last year, Democratic opponent Mary Burke slammed his record on women’s health issues. Walker avoided discussing abortion and declined to complete a Pro-Life Wisconsin survey, forfeiting the group’s endorsement. As he lagged in the polls, his campaign released an ad that defended the ultrasound law but also gave some the impression that he supported leaving abortion decisions to women and their doctors.

“He sees the polling that we see, and he knows that it’s not popular to say you want to ban abortion in Wisconsin,” said Nicole Safar, Planned Parenthood of Wisconsin’s policy director.

Now that Walker might compete for the Republican nomination, he is touting his record. A clear majority of Republicans are opposed to abortion in most cases and express support for a variety of restrictions, including bans after 20 weeks into a pregnancy. Evangelical Christians are among the most opposed, and they made up 57 percent of GOP caucus-goers in Iowa in 2012 and half of all GOP primary voters in states where exit polls are available.

Walker steps into less popular territory in espousing absolute opposition to abortion. For example, a large majority of Americans say a woman should be able to get an abortion if the pregnancy is a result of rape.

When asked last weekend why he opposes abortion in all cases, Walker simply stated that he's pro-life — and then went after Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton for favoring fewer restrictions on abortion.

"Which I think," he said, "puts her squarely out of touch of where most Americans are at."

Scott Walker: 'I Ran Against a Woman' and Won - Bloomberg Politics // Bloomberg //

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker on Friday offered up a not-so-subtle suggestion that he has what it takes to beat Hillary Clinton, recalling the time he "ran against a woman."

Speaking to donors at Mitt Romney's E2 Summit in Utah, Walker pointed to his re-election victory in November 2014 against Democrat Mary Burke, and suggested that it's "quite offensive" for Democrats to suggest that women only care about abortion.

"The women I talk to care about a whole bunch of things," he said.

"I don't think the answer is to run away from your positions."

"They care about making sure our schools are living up to the expectations of our children and our grandchildren. They care about making sure our sons and daughters who go to college can graduate with a degree and actually find a job," he said. "They care about being able to make decisions about their health care, instead of having the government do it through Obamacare."

The governor has drawn extra attention from Democrats and abortion-rights groups this month, after saying that he'll sign legislation calling for a 20-week abortion ban in his state, even if it doesn't include an exemption for rape or incest.

Walker, who is expected to join the race for the GOP nomination for president, said Republicans shouldn't shy away from their views, but that tone matters.

"I don't think the answer is to run away from your positions," he said. "Just make it clear to the American people that this is where you stand."

In 2016, Walker said his party should "transfer that same strategy" in trying to confront Democrats, "whether it's me or somebody else."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recently, Republican women, including presidential candidate and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, have also been asserting loudly that their party holds the best ideas for women and that Democrats shouldn't hold a near-monopoly on their vote because of social issues.

Walker, who has in recent months taken a tougher stance on immigration, also celebrated the U.S. as a land of opportunity for immigrants, as he criticized a government that he said fosters "dependency" instead of providing opportunity.

"The reason they came here was because it was one of the few places left in the world where it didn't matter what class you were born in, it didn't matter what your parents did for a living," he said. "In America, you can do and be anything you want."

Several Republican candidates have struggled to present themselves as acceptable both to the party's primary voters, who often support deportations of immigrants, and donors, who often favor a path to legal status. Walker faced accusations of flip-flopping on immigration in March, after he dropped his support of "amnesty" for the millions of immigrants living in the country without authorization.

Citing collective bargaining law, Scott Walker says Wisconsin's rank on ACT test has risen to second //
Politifact // Tom Kertscher – June 12, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker is a contender for president largely because of the collective bargaining reforms -- affecting teachers and most other public employees -- that he signed into law following massive protests in Madison.

On June 2, 2015, at a Florida gathering of announced and likely Republican candidates for the White House, Walker credited the March 2011 law for what he said was Wisconsin's improved ranking on the ACT college preparation test.

"A lot of protesters at the time claimed that public education was going to fail," Walker said, then went on to list changes made by what is known as Act 10.

"I'm proud to tell you that today, we no longer have seniority or tenure. That means we can hire and fire based on merit, we can pay based on performance. That means we can put the best and the brightest in our classrooms and we can pay them to be there.

"I said the proof is in the pudding; the facts don't lie. Four years later, graduation rates are up, third-grade reading scores are up, ACT scores are now second-best in the country for states where more than half the kids take the exam."

Saying Wisconsin's ACT scores are now second-best suggests Wisconsin's ranking on the test has improved since Act 10 and that the law played a role.

Let's see.

Where we've been

Two previous fact checks help set the table for evaluating Walker's claim.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. In February 2011, with the protests being carried out daily, the Wisconsin Democratic Party claimed that the five states that outlaw collective bargaining for teachers all ranked below 44th in the nation in test scores, while Wisconsin ranked second. PolitiFact National rated the claim False, partly because the data cited for both major college preparation tests -- the ACT and the SAT -- was a decade old.

More importantly, in terms of evaluating Walker's claim, our colleagues concluded after talking with experts that "it's impossible to know whether collective bargaining has any role in causing test scores to rise. That's because countless other demographic, economic and cultural factors play a role in shaping a state's test scores."

2. In June 2014, we rated Mostly True a Walker claim that graduation rates and third-grade reading scores in Wisconsin were higher than when he took office in January 2011. Both numbers were up compared with the year before Walker took office. But we found that some credit may be owed to prior elected officials, because the trend lines hadn't really changed much going back deeper into the pre-Walker era.

We also noted in that item that Wisconsin students' longstanding high-achievement scores on the ACT are well known.

But let's flesh them out.

Here are Wisconsin's average composite scores on the ACT, and where Wisconsin ranked among the states where more than half the students take the exam. Those are the ones Walker specifically cited in making the claim. We took a look at the three years before and the three years after 2011, when Act 10 was adopted.

So, Wisconsin's rank moved from third to second in 2012, the year after Act 10 was adopted, and has remained there.

But that's not because Wisconsin's long-stable composite score has improved. Indeed, the score is virtually unchanged since Act 10.

Moreover, as we noted previously, there is no evidence to show how any one factor affects ACT scores -- particularly an indirect factor such as a personnel policy like Act 10.

Matthew Di Carlo, senior research fellow at the Albert Shanker Institute, which studies education policy, reiterated that it would be "enormously complicated" to determine how any one factor such as socioeconomic status affects ACT scores. That's all the more true for changes in collective bargaining -- a policy that affects personnel rather than one, such as tutoring, that directly affects student learning, he said.

And while Act 10 could have some indirect effects on ACT scores -- such as through the retention of teachers -- those effects couldn't be gauged for some period of years, Di Carlo said.

Our rating

Walker said that four years after his collective bargaining law took effect, ACT scores in Wisconsin "are now second-best in the country for states where more than half the kids take the exam."

There is an element of truth in Walker's statement, in that Wisconsin's rank moved from third to second in 2012, the year after the Act 10 collective bargaining reforms were adopted. But the rank didn't improve because of an improvement in Wisconsin's score. And there is no evidence that Act 10 affected the ranking.

For a statement that has an element of truth but ignores critical facts that would give a different impression, we rate the claim Mostly False.

Scott Walker, Professors Clash Over Tenure in Wisconsin // US News // Allie Bidwell – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tensions over tenure are running high in Wisconsin as part of a battle between government and higher education that's providing a possible preview of one White House hopeful's education platform.

Wisconsin is the only state in the country where academic tenure is protected by law, but a budget plan approved by the GOP-controlled legislature's Joint Finance Committee would remove that safeguard for professors in the state university system and cut its budget by $250 million. The plan is backed by Gov. Scott Walker – who's expected to announce in the coming weeks that he's running for the Republican presidential nomination – and would shift control of the tenure policies to the university system's board of regents.

Republican lawmakers have said the change is simply a shift in power, and Walker spokeswoman Laurel Patrick said the change was part of a larger plan to give the university system more power over creating its own policies. But the proposal would also greatly expand provisions for how and when tenured faculty can be laid off or fired. Those provisions include budgetary constraints and program changes, and the proposal has been met with fierce opposition from professors in the state university system.

At the University of Wisconsin-Madison, the faculty senate called an emergency meeting this week and passed a resolution condemning the plan.

The budget proposal also changes state law regarding shared governance, which gives faculty members deciding power on issues like curriculum, instruction and personnel matters. It instead would give faculty an advisory responsibility on those issues.

Such language, the faculty members said in their resolution, "will lead to the demoralization and/or departure of substantial numbers of faculty, will have negative repercussions for recruiting outstanding new faculty, and will seriously damage UW-Madison's national competitiveness and the faculty's ability to grow the economic future of the state and to serve its students and its citizens."

"If we allow ourselves to be led down this path laid out before us, other great universities will follow. Then there will be nobody left to 'follow the indications of truth wherever they may lead,'" associate professor David Vanness said during the Tuesday meeting, referring to a plaque outside the campus' main administration building that commemorates the academic pursuit of truth. "We will sift where it is safe to sift. We will winnow where we are told to winnow. Our pace of discovery will slow and our reputation will falter."

National organizations, too, have chimed in on the issue. In a letter to the University of Wisconsin System Board of Regents and University of Wisconsin System President Ray Cross, the American Association of University Professors said the changes in tenure and due process, combined with the proposed budget cut, "amount to a direct attack on higher education as a public good."

"Tenure and due process do not only protect individual faculty members in their teaching, research, and publication efforts, as well as their right to speak on matters of public concern," wrote Rudy Fichtenbaum, the association's president. "They also protect the collective right of the faculty to participate in the formulation of academic policy and budget priorities and to use their professional expertise to recommend hiring and retaining faculty and administrators so that the university system can best serve the public interest and the citizens of the state."

Walker and the Republican-controlled state legislature have repeatedly been at odds with the state's higher education community. The 2015-17 budget originally proposed a $300 million cut to the university system, which has since dropped to $250 million but is still opposed by faculty.

In an op-ed this week for the Quad-City Times, Walker touted his record on education, saying "quality training and a solid education are vital components of wage growth and economic mobility."

"And the affordability of that education is an important consideration, especially for families whose children are heading to college," Walker wrote. "That's why our last budget committed the highest level of need-based financial aid in state history, and froze tuition at the University of Wisconsin for two years. Our current budget continues the tuition freeze for another two years."

When he first took office in 2011, Walker also passed a law – Act 10 – that limited the collective bargaining rights of public sector unions, including teachers unions. He has credited the changes with increasing student test scores and graduation rates, and has since referred to the combined higher education budget cuts and push to grant more flexibility to the university system as "the Act 10 of higher education."

His moves involving unions and higher education, considered traditional bastions of liberalism in conservative circles, have made Walker a GOP hero and raised his national profile ahead of his likely 2016 run. But such aggressiveness may not necessarily distinguish him from the rest of the crowded Republican presidential field.

Barmak Nassirian, director of federal policy relations and policy analysis for the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, says that based on his track record, Walker would take a "very instrumental view" of higher education should he win the White House.

"That is not in itself, frankly, atypical for lots of policymakers, Republican and Democrat, who view higher education in almost sort of strictly competitiveness, jobs, economic development terms," Nassirian says. "You take more of a rigid-like productivity perspective on how higher education ought to be run and how it ought to be managed and funded. So you look around on a fairly short horizon and attempt to identify those programs that tend to be good vocational preparation venues and take a kinder approach to them than you might to those things that might not be able to demonstrate in concrete terms why they're worth funding."

In this Jan. 13, 2015, file photo, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker acknowledges people in the gallery during Governor's State of the State address to a joint session of the Legislature in the Assembly chambers at the state Capitol in Madison, Wis. Walker has transformed Wisconsin politics, winning three elections in four years and signing laws that weaken unions, crippling a key component of the Democratic Party. But the likely Republican presidential contender has had less success changing Wisconsin’s economy and budget. The state lags in job growth and its budget faces a shortfall. It’s a record that complicates Walker’s path in early primary states as he sells himself as a reformer.

Ann Marcus, a professor of higher education at New York University-Steinhardt, also says Walker "could do less damage" as president than as a governor.

"The federal government doesn't have such a large role in higher education. The key area for federal involvement is financial aid, including loans," Marcus says. "However, the federal government does not have a role in faculty issues, nor in curriculum. Nor does it have a role in direct funding of colleges and universities. States are the key player, and in the U.S., there is great variation among the states in terms of priorities, funding [and] controls."

She adds: "Walker may be experiencing a short-term benefit with his attacks on higher education, but I believe ... that he will experience some significant pushback once the people of Wisconsin have had a chance to see the consequences."

he won't make an announcement on entering the presidential race until after the state's budget business is concluded at the end of June.

The Koch Brothers Usually Have Scott Walker's Back. Not This Time. // Mother Jones // Russ Choma – June 12, 2015

The Koch brothers and their political machine have long been key allies of Wisconsin governor and presumptive 2016 hopeful Scott Walker. With the GOP presidential field getting more crowded by the day and political observers wondering who will win the Koch Primary—and the financial backing of these billionaires and their donor network—Walker has sparked a controversy in his home state in which and he and Team Koch are on opposite sides.

When Walker announced a plan last week to spend $250 million in taxpayer money for a proposed $500 million basketball arena in downtown Milwaukee, the local chapter of the Koch-founded advocacy group Americans for Prosperity joined the chorus of detractors who condemned the project. The National Basketball Association is demanding the new venue and is threatening that the Milwaukee Bucks franchise may have to move if the arena isn't built by 2017. This has put Walker in a tough spot. The failure to retain the team would be an ugly black eye for Walker, but the plan to spend taxpayer funds propping up a highly lucrative private business is irritating Wisconsin Republicans and Democrats alike.

While Walker's forays into union-busting had strong conservative backing, the political dynamics involved in the public financing of sports arenas and stadiums are much different. Across the nation in recent years, conservatives and progressive groups and activists have questioned the notion that financing arenas for sports franchises with taxpayer funds will spur the local economy. And Walker is feeling the backlash.

Wisconsin Democrats predictably oppose Walker's plan, but few of his fellow Republicans are rushing to join him in standing with the NBA. At the moment, 12 of 19 GOP state senators are against the idea. In the state's lower chamber, Walker's not faring much better. State representative David Murphy (R), who recently called Walker's plan to slash $300 million from the state university system "a bold vision for the future," declared, "I'm not a believer in government supporting sports arenas for millionaire players and billionaire owners."

Perhaps most mortifying for Walker is that the plan is being publicly panned by the Wisconsin chapter of Americans for Prosperity. It was AFP that came to Walker's aid when his anti-union legislation sparked massive rallies and protests in 2011 and again when Walker came close to being ousted from office in a recall effort. But Wisconsin's AFP chapter is vociferously dumping on the stadium deal.

"The current deal is based on fuzzy math, complicated accounting and millions of taxpayer dollars," AFP state director David Fladeboe said last week. "This proposal needs to be rejected and the people of Wisconsin need to be protected."

"This proposal needs to be rejected and the people of Wisconsin need to be protected," said AFP's state director last week.

The fuzzy math Fladeboe is referring to comes from Walker's sales pitch for the arena proposal, which has the less-than-catchy tagline: "Cheaper to Keep Them."

Walker contends that if the Bucks leave, the state will miss out on millions in tax revenue, not the least of which will come from the wealthy athletes who play at the new arena. And, Walker has argued, if the arena isn't built, the lot it's slated to be constructed on will never generate as much economic activity as a basketball arena would bring.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Critics of the proposal say that Walker's numbers, specifically the $250 million price tag, seem understated. One estimate is that the real price, when the long-term interest costs are factored in, will be at least $320 million. Another estimate pegs the cost at $400 million. Either way, the cost is greater than the savings of $300 million that are supposed to come from Walker's proposed cuts in the University of Wisconsin system for the next two years.

Walker's plan may be a very public air ball if he doesn't find a way to devote serious time and political capital to selling the project. That may be difficult, since Walker's focus increasingly seems to be on his possible presidential bid. He is already spending a significant amount of time out-of-state in places such as Iowa—trips that are irritating some allies—and his attention will only grow more divided if he launches a presidential campaign.

If the state Senate does not approve the inclusion of Walker's arena project in the state's annual budget by the end of June, the debate will drag on until the fall—prime campaigning time for Iowa's bellwether caucus. At that point, in order to avoid the loss of one of the state's three professional sports teams, Walker may have to shift his focus away from the campaign trail to manage a contentious budget fight that his staunchest allies have abandoned him on.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz Cherry-Picks Terrorism Comments // HuffPo // D'Angelo Gore – June 12, 2015

The following post first appeared on FactCheck.org.

Sen. Ted Cruz has criticized President Obama and the White House for not mentioning how religious discrimination fueled terrorist attacks in Paris and Libya this year. But to make his point, Cruz focuses on certain remarks and ignores others.

Discussing the killing of four people at a Jewish supermarket in Paris, Cruz claimed Obama "described that attack as a, quote, 'random act of violence.' " Obama never said those words. He denounced "vicious zealots who ... randomly shoot a bunch of folks in a deli," and the White House said Obama meant the victims were random, not the attack. Obama previously had described it as an act of anti-Semitism.

Cruz also claimed that "when ISIS beheaded 22 Coptic Christians, the White House put out a statement saying they were killed because of their Egyptian citizenship." The White House statement referred to those killed as "Egyptian citizens," not Egyptian Christians. But it didn't say they were killed because of their nationality.

Cruz, a GOP presidential candidate, made his statements at a May 30 town hall in New Hampshire hosted by radio host Jeff Kuhner. He had made the same claims at a Family Research Council retreat for pastors in Washington, D.C., on May 21.

Fellow Republican candidates Rick Perry and Mike Huckabee have made similar statements in the past.

Let's review what Obama and the White House said about those terrorist acts.

Not a Random Act

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Jan. 9, Amedy Coulibaly shot and killed four people, and held more than a dozen others hostage, inside Hyper Cacher, a kosher grocery store in Paris. Prior to the attack, Coulibaly, according to a Reuters report, had called BFM-TV, a French TV station, “to claim allegiance to [the] Islamic State, saying he wanted to defend Palestinians and target Jews.”

Cruz, during the town hall meeting, claimed that Obama, at the time, suggested that Coulibaly’s actions were “random” and unrelated to religion.

Cruz, May 30: A few months ago, when we saw the horrific terrorist attack in Paris, President Obama described that attack as a, quote, “random act of violence.” When radical Islamists with butcher knives go into a kosher deli to murder Jews because of their Jewish faith, there ain’t nothing random about that at all.

Cruz is not the only Republican presidential contender to have criticized Obama’s comments.

A Feb. 11, statement from former Texas Gov. Rick Perry said that he was “appalled that President Obama has chosen to deny the vicious anti-Semitic motivation of the attack on a kosher Jewish grocery in Paris on January 9th.”

And former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, in a Feb. 11, Facebook post, wrote that “Obama said it’s entirely legitimate ‘to be deeply concerned when you’ve got a bunch of violent, vicious zealots who behead people or randomly shoot a bunch of folks in a deli in Paris.’ ” Huckabee went on to write, “But it wasn’t ‘random.’ It was a Jewish deli. One of the radical Islamic ‘zealots’ even told French TV that they were singling out Jews.”

Here is Obama’s complete statement from the Vox interview, published Feb. 9, with Executive Editor Matthew Yglesias:

Obama, Feb. 9: Look, the point is this: my first job is to protect the American people. It is entirely legitimate for the American people to be deeply concerned when you’ve got a bunch of violent, vicious zealots who behead people or randomly shoot a bunch of folks in a deli in Paris. We devote enormous resources to that, and it is right and appropriate for us to be vigilant and aggressive in trying to deal with that — the same way a big city mayor’s got to cut the crime rate down if he wants that city to thrive. But we also have to attend to a lot of other issues, and we’ve got to make sure we’re right-sizing our approach so that what we do isn’t counterproductive.

The following day, in a press briefing, White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest attempted to clarify Obama’s statement.

“I believe the point that the president was trying to make is that these individuals were not specifically targeted. These were individuals who happened to randomly be in this deli and were shot while they were there,” Earnest told reporters. “So if you want to question the president’s placement of the adverb in the sentence, the adverb in this case being ‘randomly,’ you can. But that’s the point the president was trying to make.”

When Jonathan Karl of ABC News asked if Obama had “any doubt that that deli was attacked because it was a kosher deli,” Earnest said, “no.”

And Obama didn’t “deny the vicious anti-Semitic motivation of the attack,” as Perry had claimed. Even before the Vox interview and Earnest’s clarification, the president had said that the terrorist attack was motivated by anti-Semitism.

In a Jan. 22, statement for a United Nations meeting on the rise of anti-Semitism, Obama said: “Anti-Semitic attacks like the recent terrorist attack on a kosher supermarket in Paris pose a threat that extends beyond the Jewish community. They also threaten the values we hold dear — pluralism, diversity, and the freedoms of religion and expression."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And on Jan. 27, International Holocaust Remembrance Day, another statement from Obama said that "the recent terrorist attacks in Paris serve as a painful reminder of our obligation to condemn and combat rising anti-Semitism in all its forms."

Egyptian Christians

Cruz also claimed that "when ISIS beheaded 22 Coptic Christians, the White House put out a statement saying they were killed because of their Egyptian citizenship." He added, "That is not why they were killed."

But that is not what the White House statement said.

On Feb. 15, an Islamic State faction in Libya released video of its mass execution of 21, not 22, Coptic Christians from Egypt. According to a BBC News report, "A caption made it clear the men were targeted because of their faith."

It's true that a statement from Earnest, the White House press secretary, referred to those killed as "Egyptian citizens" without mentioning that they were also Christians. But the statement also made no mention of a motive for the killings, as Cruz claimed it had.

Earnest, Feb. 15: The United States condemns the despicable and cowardly murder of twenty-one Egyptian citizens in Libya by ISIL-affiliated terrorists. We offer our condolences to the families of the victims and our support to the Egyptian government and people as they grieve for their fellow citizens. ISIL's barbarity knows no bounds. It is unconstrained by faith, sect, or ethnicity. This wanton killing of innocents is just the most recent of the many vicious acts perpetrated by ISIL-affiliated terrorists against the people of the region, including the murders of dozens of Egyptian soldiers in the Sinai, which only further galvanizes the international community to unite against ISIL.

This heinous act once again underscores the urgent need for a political resolution to the conflict in Libya, the continuation of which only benefits terrorist groups, including ISIL. We call on all Libyans to strongly reject this and all acts of terrorism and to unite in the face of this shared and growing threat. We continue to strongly support the efforts of the United Nations Special Representative of the Secretary-General Bernardino Leon to facilitate formation of a national unity government and help foster a political solution in Libya.

The administration did mention that the victims were Christians after that.

This is what Secretary of State John Kerry said on Feb. 18 at a White House summit on violent extremism:

Kerry, Feb. 18: Earlier this week, with the release of a video showing the medieval murder of 21 Coptic Christians from Egypt on a beach in Libya, the world has once again been reminded of the absolutely unspeakable and undeniable evil of ISIL, which many of us prefer to call Daesh. Twenty-one innocent people were violently executed en masse in the most grotesque way simply because of their faith, and though Daesh has proven that it doesn't need any rationale to kill people.

And on Feb. 19, President Obama, during a speech at the same summit, said that "ISIL-linked terrorists murdered Egyptians in the Sinai Peninsula, and their slaughter of Egyptian Christians in Libya has shocked the world."

Cruz, Paul push for ban on indefinite detention of US citizens // The Hill // Jordain Carney – June 12, 2015

Two 2016 presidential competitors have joined forces to get a ban on the indefinite detention of U.S. citizens included in an annual defense policy bill.

Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and Rand Paul (R-Ky.), both of whom are running for president, have joined up with other senators to introduce an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), currently before the Senate, that would ban indefinite detention of U.S. citizens or legal permanent residents, without being charged or given a trial, unless authorized by Congress.

Sens. Mike Lee (R-Utah), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) also put their names on the provision.

"The Constitution does not allow President Obama, or any President, to apprehend an American citizen, arrested on U.S. soil, and detain these citizens indefinitely without a trial," Cruz said in a statement. "While we must vigorously protect national security by pursuing violent terrorists and preventing acts of terror, we must also ensure our most basic rights as American citizens are protected."

The senators added that they hoped the amendment would clarify "ongoing legal ambiguities," including that idea that Americans can be indefinitely detained under the 2001 authorization for the use of military force, which authorized military operations against al Qaeda.

The senators note that the 2001 authorization "cannot be construed as acts of Congress that permit indefinite detention."

Paul added, "We can and will vigorously investigate and prosecute all who seek to do us harm, and we can do so while respecting the constitutional liberties of American citizens."

Paul and Cruz have argued that previous NDAAs have given the administration the ability to indefinitely detain Americans.

The senators got a similar amendment included in the Senate's NDAA in 2012, but it wasn't in the final bill signed by President Obama.

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie's Foreign Trips Cost Taxpayers $120,000 // AP // Jill Colvin – June 12, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's recent foreign trips to the United Kingdom, Mexico and Canada cost New Jersey taxpayers nearly $124,000, his office says.

The numbers, released by his office Friday evening, cover security and security-related transportation expenses for each trip, as well as the expenses incurred by Christie's official photographer.

While the trips have been billed as official trade missions to encourage investment in the state, they also provided Christie, a governor with little foreign policy experience, a chance to build his foreign policy resume as he considers a run for the Republican nomination for president. The trips included meetings and photo ops with world leaders as well as speeches.

Christie's three-day trip to the United Kingdom in February was the most expensive of the three, costing taxpayers $62,653.19, according to the numbers provided by his office. A trip to Canada in early December 2014 cost taxpayers $29,800, while a trip to Mexico that September cost $21,822.06.

In all, taxpayer dollars will cover $114,275 in security and transportation costs, which includes state troopers' airfare and hotel costs, but not their salaries. In addition, taxpayers will cover $9,617.79 in expenses logged by Tim Larsen, Christie's chief of photography and visual communications.

That brings the total bill incurred by taxpayers for the three trips to $123,893.04.

Christie and his traveling delegations' other travel expenses were paid for by Choose New Jersey, a non-profit state economic development group funded by corporate donations, which aims to promote investment and job creation in the state. The governor's office declined to provide those costs and the group has not responded to numerous requests for comment in recent months.

Media outlets have been requesting the totals since Christie returned from Mexico. A spokesman for the governor's office, Kevin Roberts, declined to comment further.

Christie's trips included several foreign policy speeches, numerous closed-door meetings with local officials and plenty of photo ops with world leaders.

In Mexico last September, Christie delivered a speech criticizing President Barack Obama for failing to approve construction of the Keystone XL oil pipeline and called for stronger relations with Mexico and Canada. He also traveled to the city of Puebla with President Enrique Peña Nieto, where he received an enthusiastic welcome from students in an outdoor arena.

In the United Kingdom in February, Christie met behind closed doors with British Prime Minister David Cameron and enjoyed a soccer match. He also drew controversy when he said parents should have some measure of choice when it comes to vaccinating their children. He later walked those comments back.

The security costs from the three recent trips are similar to the nearly $40,000 taxpayers paid for Christie's first trade mission to Israel and Jordan in April 2012.

Christie told an audience in Washington recently that he's eying additional travel — potentially to Latin America — later this year.

Christie says he'll make a decision about whether he's running for the Republication presidential nomination later this month.

Chris Christie takes a veiled swipe at Rand Paul over Patriot Act // MSNBC // Aliyah Frumin – June 12, 2015

In an apparent swipe at Sen. Rand Paul, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie on Friday blasted politicians who have tried to raise money off of their opposition to the Patriot Act – going as far as calling such actions a “disgrace.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During his opening remarks at a town hall meeting in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Christie told the crowd that the president's No. 1 priority is to protect Americans. "And yet, you've got folks—some of them running for president—who stood on the floor of the United States Senate and weakened our country and then sent out videos of it to try and raise money."

"They bragged about how much money they raised ... To me, that's a disgrace," added the governor, who is expected to announce whether he will officially run for president in the next few weeks. Christie has argued for the re-authorization of the Patriot Act, arguing it's an important tool to combat terrorism.

It's an issue that has divided Republicans, and Christie's latest criticism seems aimed at differentiating himself from the rest of the emerging GOP field.

Paul, who has announced that he'll seek the 2016 GOP nomination, held an 11-hour filibuster-like speech in May to argue against the government's surveillance of Americans' phone records, insisting it tramples of civil liberties and allows the government to spy on innocent people. Afterward, he sent out emails to supporters asking for cash with subject lines like "Last night I put NSA spying on life support."

On May 31, some provisions of the Patriot Act – including a program allowing the government to collect phone records of millions of Americans – expired after the Senate was unable to pass legislation to extend them. Most of those provisions were eventually restored through the USA Freedom Act earlier this month. However, the law was changed to stop the NSA from continuing its mass phone data collection, with phone companies retaining the data. The NSA can get information about specific individuals if it is approved by a federal court.

Similar to Paul, Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas has said he is against a clean extension of the Patriot Act. After a recent federal appeals court ruling that the government's collection of millions of Americans' phone records is illegal, Cruz said the ruling confirmed what many Americans already know—that the NSA "went too far in collecting phone records."

Like Christie, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush have argued in favor of the Patriot Act.

Christie has frequently butted heads with Paul over the issue of surveillance. In May, the governor accused Paul of "siding with" NSA leaker Edward Snowden (who the governor called a "criminal") by opposing efforts to extend the Patriot Act. At the town hall on Friday, Christie painted himself as the only potential or declared candidate who has real world experience fighting terrorism. He pointed to his nomination by then-president George W. Bush to be U.S. Attorney in New Jersey right before the 9/11 attacks and how he used tools, including the Patriot Act, to go after terrorists.

The governor's trip to the first-in-the-nation caucus state is his first visit there in three months. By contrast, he has taken nine trips to the early voting state of New Hampshire this year alone. Christie told the crowd on Friday that there was a common misconception that his bold and sometimes brash style would not go over well in Iowa. "I haven't met one person in Iowa who wasn't direct," said the governor. Such critics, he insisted, "misunderstand me, and they misunderstand you."

Surveys indicate Christie would have an uphill battle in the Hawkeye State. According to an average of polling data compiled by RealClearPolitics surrounding the Iowa Republican Presidential Caucus, Christie garners just 4.2% support and is eighth place behind Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (18.2%), Rubio (11%), Paul (8.6%), former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (9.4%), Bush (9.2%), Cruz (7.6%) and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson (8.4%).

Chris Christie hits Ted Cruz for 'hypocrisy' on disaster aid // CNN // Ashley Killough – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chris Christie accused likely presidential rival Ted Cruz of "hypocrisy" for supporting federal emergency aid after last month's devastating floods in Texas but voting against government relief funding two years and a half years ago after Superstorm Sandy wrecked the East Coast.

The New Jersey governor, who was holding a town hall Friday during the final leg of his two-day trip to Iowa, was making the argument that the next president needs to be someone who understands what it's like to sustain a natural disaster -- unlike "some of our friends in Congress, right?"

"We have Senator Cruz -- who voted against Sandy relief -- now he says he's got floods in Texas. He says 'Hey, we need some help down here in Texas.' It's great, right?" asked Christie, who is expected to announce his presidential decision in the coming weeks.

He also referred to Colorado lawmakers who made similar protests to the Sandy bill but supported federal relief when floods hit their state in 2013.

Cruz expressed support for federal funds for his state in late May despite voting against a massive package in early 2013 dedicated to post-Sandy recovery efforts. Standing on what he said was a matter of principle, he and other conservatives argued that the bill contained too much extra money for items unrelated to the storm.

At the time, Christie ripped into Congressional Republicans for delaying a vote on the package. Congress ultimately passed a scaled-back version worth $9.7 billion in early January 2013. Later that month, it approved a much larger package worth $50 billion.

"People get religion real quick," Christie said Friday, before taking on a tone of voice in an imitation of Cruz. "'All of the sudden the principled vote that I'm making here on the floor of the United States Senate is I'm not going to spend this kind of money on this kind of thing unless it happens in my state. And then if it does, then it's an absolutely appropriate expenditure of money.' I mean, come on. Come on."

Christie said Texas should still get the funds "because what's more important is not his hypocrisy; it's the people of his state who are suffering and there are communities that need to be rebuilt."

In a statement to CNN, Cruz said Christie is a "good man" and noted that he has defended Christie amid the Bridgegate scandal. But he argued that his view hasn't changed, saying he supports federal aid as long as it is limited to recovery and relief efforts.

"I like and respect Chris Christie; indeed, I've been vocal defending him from unfair charges that have been leveled his direction. Whatever insults are launched, I'm not going to respond in kind. He's a good man. On the merits, my view is exactly the same as it was before: of course, the federal government should assist with disaster aid, whether for Hurricane Sandy or for flooding in Texas. But politicians in Washington shouldn't load up disaster relief with billions in unrelated pork-barrel spending."

Christie attended NBA Finals on PAC's dime // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 12, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie (R-N.J.) attended Game 3 of the NBA Finals earlier this week with a ticket paid for by his political action committee, a report says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie's Leadership Matters for America PAC funded his travel to Cleveland on Tuesday for the hotly anticipated basketball game, according to the National Journal.

It also bought Christie's near-courtside seat to the game between the Cleveland Cavaliers and the Golden State Warriors.

Christie's state spokesman told the National Journal on Thursday afternoon that the governor's appearance at the contest was "through the PAC," it said.

His spokesman added that Christie, a possible 2016 GOP presidential candidate, was in Ohio attending private and fundraising meetings the day of tipoff.

He declined to discuss any link those activities may have had with Tuesday night's NBA game.

The National Journal said on Thursday that Christie's PAC had not filed any receipts or disbursements with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) over his attendance at Tuesday night's game.

The Columbus Dispatch posted Twitter photos on Wednesday showing Christie sitting next to Urban Meyer, the head football coach for Ohio State University, during Tuesday night's game.

Christie has previously faced questions over his spending habits at other sporting events.

An analysis released last month found that Christie had spent about $300,000 in taxpayer funds on food and drinks during his five years in office.

New Jersey Watchdog reported on May 11 that Christie had doled out more than $82,000 at MetLife Stadium, home of the New York Giants and New York Jets franchises in the National Football League (NFL).

The New Jersey Republican State Commission (NJRSC) later reimbursed the state for the full $300,000, thus ensuring no cost to taxpayers.

Christie has additionally stopped using his office's expense account while at sporting venues.

The New Jersey governor has said he is close to deciding whether he will seek the White House next year.

Should he run, he would enter one of the most crowded GOP presidential fields in history.

Republicans currently have nine official candidates on their ballots, with more possible in the coming months.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham Challenges Republican Rivals on Debt Ceiling // TIME // Zeke Miller – June 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham is seeking to differentiate himself from his GOP presidential rivals any way he can. On Friday he opens up a new front—challenging his opponents to take a stance on raising the federal debt limit.

Bitter internal divisions within the GOP aired in 2011 and 2013, bringing the U.S. to the brink of defaulting on its obligations. A similar fight is brewing for this fall, when the nation will once again hit its borrowing cap, this time in the shadow of a presidential primary and for the first time with Republican majorities in both chambers of Congress.

“At the end of the day, something has to be done. We can’t default,” Graham told reporters at the E2 Summit, organized by former Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney. “There will be a bunch of people in our party and in theirs saying no, no, no. Somebody’s got to find a way to say yes.”

“When you look at the number of Republicans who say we will never raise the debt ceiling if you put a gun to their head, you’re going to have to get Democrats to do this,” he added. “It’s going to be a challenge for our party and I think people running to be president should speak about what would you do as president, what would you do as a person wanting to be president when it came time to lift the debt ceiling. Because it is about leadership.”

In laying down the gauntlet, the South Carolina defense hawk is further positioning himself as a contrarian on party orthodoxy, with his support for immigration reform and efforts to combat climate change. Graham is also attempting to force his Republican opponents, who are navigating between the wishes of the business community to avoid more uncertainty and the frustration among the conservative base with the growth of the federal government, into a tougher spot.

Presidential Candidate Lindsey Graham Introduces 20-Week 'Pain-Capable' Late-Term Abortion Ban in Senate; Promises Vote in 2015 // The Christian Post // Sam Smith – June 12, 2015

Presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., reintroduced legislation in the Senate Thursday that would ban abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy except in cases of rape and incest, a measure that passed the House of Representatives by a 242-184 vote last month.

At a Capitol Hill news conference, Graham promised that the bill, titled the Pain-Capable Unborn Child Protection Act, would be debated and voted on this year.

"This legislation is groundbreaking yet simple at the same time. What I love most about this piece of legislation is how simple it is," Graham said. "Do you believe that at 20 weeks in the pregnancy, five months, when medical encyclopedias are encouraging young parents to sing to their child because they can begin to recognize the voice, that this is a stage in development where you should be very excited because your child is well on their way? Does the government have a legitimate and compelling interest to protect that baby? The answer, I believe, is yes."

Graham reasoned that since the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Roe v. Wade, medical sciences have advanced enough to acknowledge that unborn children at 20 weeks of pregnancy are capable of feeling excruciating pain and that there is a reasonable governmental interest in protecting those unborn children.

"Roe v. Wade was about medical viability. Roe v. Wade acknowledges that there is a compelling state interest in protecting the unborn child," Graham argued. "The standard of medical practice in America is that if you operate on an unborn child at 20 weeks, which happens fairly often ..., you have to provide anesthesia to the baby because they are capable of feeling extreme pain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Here is the choice for America — if a doctor is required to provide anesthesia to the child to help save its life because they feel pain in the process of being operated on, is it OK for society to say, 'Well, at that stage in the pregnancy we don't want the operation to be an abortion?'" Graham continued. "I believe that most Americans will say yes."

The United States is one of just seven countries in the world that doesn't ban abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy, putting the U.S. in the same "club" as systemic human rights violators such as China and North Korea.

"This bill would put us out of a league of nations who have refrained from protecting children after that point. We are one of only seven nations that have refrained from protecting children after 20 weeks," Susan B. Anthony List president Marjorie Dannenfelser said at the press conference. "We are in the company of China, North Korea, Vietnam and others. That is not the human rights club that we would like to be in and we need to be out."

Graham said that there are some exceptions in the legislation for pregnancies that occur as a result of rape or incest and said that women would need to report the claim of incest or rape to a counselor or medical doctor at least 48 hours prior to the abortion.

When asked whether Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., would push this bill for debate, Graham explained that McConnell is one of the co-sponsors of the bill and promised a vote by year's end.

"He is very favorable to this bill and I think he is a co-sponsor and we will find time on the calendar," Graham asserted. "I can promise you a debate in 2015 and a vote."

Graham's bill could force some of his Republican colleagues, who are representing historically Democratic states, to take a position on this legislation, which some pundits claim could hurt their reelection chances. But the legislation could also force a few Democratic senators who represent historically conservative states to do the same.

"Don't get into politics if you don't want to talk about things like this. This is why you want to get elected, I think. Whether you are for or against it, this is something worth talking about," Graham said. "I think if you are in the House or the Senate, voting on this issue is required because it is an important issue. What we are looking for is a debate with those who oppose this. Tell me the upside of this. ... What are we achieving here? How are we a better nation? What is your theory of the case? Why do we want to let this happen this late in the pregnancy?

"I am dying for that debate and I am going to insist that we have that debate because we are a member of seven nations that I don't think represent who we are as Americans," Graham added.

Should the measure pass in the Senate, it could be vetoed by President Barack Obama, although he stated earlier this week that every child ought to have the opportunity to reach their "God-given potential."

"And we agree with President Obama on what he said earlier this week, here in Washington, D.C., when he spoke before the Catholic Health Association. He said this: 'A shared belief that every human being made in the image of God deserves to live in dignity. All children, no matter who they are or where they come from or how much money they were born into, ought to have the opportunity to achieve their God-given potential,'" Family Research Council President Tony Perkins explained at the press conference.

"Well, that potential, that opportunity, it begins with life," Perkins continued. "So I call upon President Obama and his party to withdraw their opposition to this bill; and I call upon President Obama to pledge his support for this measure that would help bring his administration's policies in line with his political rhetoric."

SANTORUM

For Candidates Like Rick Santorum, the Line Can Be Long to Take Flight // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 12, 2015

The 2016 presidential season may have started early — but expect it to go long.

At least that was the message from Spencer Zwick, who was the finance chairman for former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, at the 2012 Republican presidential nominee's annual donor retreat in Park City.

Speaking to reporters Thursday night, Mr. Zwick said he did not see the Republican nominee race "as an early knockout."

The reason? "If you're at 1 percent in the polls, why would you get out?" he said. "There is no downside to staying in the race. In the worst case, you might get a TV show after it all."

Look no farther, Mr. Zwick said, than Rick Santorum —a Republican presidential candidate again in 2016 who, despite little campaign infrastructure and money in 2012, forced Mr. Romney into a prolonged primary fight.

Mr. Zwick recalled a moment during the 2012 campaign, when he was waiting to catch a JetBlue red-eye back to Boston after a presidential debate in Las Vegas. The Romney team, he said, was "in full swing" — with a private charter plane and full campaign apparatus.

"And I was waiting in line at the JetBlue red-eye, and about 30 people behind me was Rick Santorum, waiting to get on a middle seat to fly to Boston to be able to go New Hampshire," Mr. Zwick recalled, shaking his head in mix of awe and admiration. "It dawned on me right there, wow, there is no barrier to entry. As long as you can have enough money to buy a commercial airline ticket to get to the next state, you've got a ticket, you can go. It was like this surreal moment I had on the campaign. Here were we, building this massive infrastructure and this political machine, and you know, Senator Santorum is standing there with his carry-on bag, getting in line."

And, Mr. Zwick added, Mr. Santorum "wasn't even Group 1. I was at least in the even more space section."

"This guy was on national TV, debating," he added, and yet "there was no campaign infrastructure."

So, Mr. Zwick concluded, expect the JetBlue primary — where just about any candidate, especially one with a wealthy donor and a "super PAC," can stay in the race — to go on, and on, and on.

Rick Santorum says he'd welcome an endorsement from Caitlyn Jenner // NY Daily News // Aliza Chasan – June 12, 2015

Rick Santorum would welcome an endorsement from former Olympic gold medalist Caitlyn Jenner if she offered one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You accept their vote, but do you accept her?” CNN’s Erin Burnett asked him in an interview Thursday night.

“My job as a human being is to treat everybody with dignity and respect, period, stop, full stop. No qualification to that,” the Republican presidential contender said.

In the past Santorum has said he would refuse to attend same-sex weddings. He’s also compared homosexuality to both incest and bestiality.

"Do I have to agree with their positions on issues or how they see America? Of course not,” Santorum said Thursday.

But a vote is a vote to Santorum.

“Because people vote for you for all sorts of reasons, and that’s fine. And I accept whatever reason anybody wants to vote for me, whoever they are,” he said.

He may have to fight Lindsey Graham for a Jenner backing though.

“If Caitlyn Jenner wants to be a Republican, she is welcome in my party,” Graham told CNN on Sunday.

HUCKABEE

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee making weekend campaign swing through South Carolina // AP – June 12, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is returning to South Carolina.

The Republican presidential hopeful begins his trip on Friday with a meet and greet at The Beacon Drive-In Restaurant in Spartanburg.

From there, he's holding a reception with the Spartanburg County GOP before taking part in the Bridging the Gap Quarterly Leadership Series. Huckabee is ending the day with an event with Benjamin House Ministry in Moore.

On Saturday, Huckabee is making stops in Gaffney and Indian Land before taking a tour of Keer America Manufacturing. In the afternoon, he's attending a barbecue hosted by the York County Republican Party in Rock Hill.

Anti-Huckabee super PAC formed // Arkansas News // John Lyon – June 12, 2015

A former Republican presidential candidate has created a super PAC to oppose Mike Huckabee’s second presidential bid, saying he wants to educate voters about Huckabee’s “horrific record as governor of Arkansas.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Truth Squad 2016 is the creation of Fred Karger of Los Angeles, who unsuccessfully sought the Republican presidential nomination in 2012. Karger is a political consultant, gay rights activist and former Hollywood actor who appeared in “Airport 1975” and “Rich Man, Poor Man.”

The super PAC said in a news release Friday it is “the first super PAC formed specifically to oppose a Republican candidate for president in 2016” and pledged to “help those whose lives were forever changed by Governor Huckabee’s actions tell their stories.”

The release includes excerpts from a Seattle Times interview with Kim Renninger, widow of Sgt. Mark Renninger, one of four police officers killed in Parkland, Wash., in 2009 by Maurice Clemmons, who had been paroled in Arkansas. Clemmons had been sentenced to 108 years in prison in Arkansas, but in 2000 Huckabee shortened his sentence, making him eligible for parole.

Renninger told the newspaper she wants to hold Huckabee accountable by telling her story because, although he was not the only person involved in Clemmons’ release — the state Parole Board had unanimously recommended that Huckabee grant executive clemency, and it ultimately voted to release Clemmons on parole — “the person who got this ball rolling was Huckabee.”

Huckabee spokeswoman Alice Stewart responded in a statement, “SuperPACs are typically funded by powerful Washington and Wall Street elites, and no one is a bigger threat to them than Gov. Huckabee, an outsider fighting for Main Street Americans. It’s heartbreaking that these widows are being exploited for the political benefit of these secret-agenda-driven SuperPAC donors. This is Washington-DC-style, gutter politics at its worst.”

Stewart said Huckabee’s heart grieves for the four slain police officers. She also pointed out that the Parole Board members who voted to release Clemmons were all appointed by former Democratic governors Bill Clinton and Jim Guy Tucker.

Huckabee served as governor of Arkansas from 1996 to 2007. In 2008, he finished second to Arizona Sen. John McCain in the Republican presidential primary race.

A super PAC in support of Huckabee’s campaign, Pursuing America’s Greatness, was created earlier this year.

KASICH

Kasich: Trade Is Critical to National Security // Fox News // Matthew Kazin – June 12, 2015

Prior to the House vote Friday on President Obama’s trade deal, Ohio Gov. John Kasich told FBN’s Neil Cavuto that the legislation stands to impact more than just the U.S. economy.

“It’s not just economic; it’s also a national security issue as well, where we can have access and involvement in parts of the world where it’s vital,” Kasich said.

The Republican governor added: “I believe that trade is a very important part of national security, and to turn this deal down, I think, would be bad.”

However, Kasich said the trade deal has pros and cons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It is best for our economy, and there are going to be workers who will be hurt,” he said. “We have to make sure that they’re going to be retrained and there’ll be opportunities for them.”

In addition to trade deal talk, Kasich also discussed the possibility of a 2016 bid for the White House.

“We’re getting closer and closer to making a decision,” he said. “I don’t want to do this just for the sake of it. I need to know that I could win.”

John Kasich Strives for Self-Control // Bloomberg News // Ben Brody – June 12, 2015

John Kasich seems to know the rap against him: He's cranky, unfocused, and impulsive. But ahead of the scrutiny of a possible presidential run, the Republican governor of Ohio is testing out a new disciplined persona.

"Everything you say now is under a microscope so I've got to think more like a scientist," he said Friday in an interview with Bloomberg Politics' Mark Halperin from Mitt Romney's E2 Summit in Utah.

That meant parrying when asked if he felt that he was competing with other candidates and hopefuls at the event, including Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, who has cast himself as a proven conservative election-winner.

“How's this discipline going?”

"The minute I say something about him, then it’s like I’m going after him," Kasich said. Later, he asked: "How am I doing on this discipline?"

"I’ve got a lot of energy and I need to know how to dose it out," he added, saying he'd learned that after a brief presidential run in 2000.

He likewise held back on policy prescriptions, saying a military commander would have to say how many troops the U.S. should send to combat ISIS as part of a coalition, not him.

During his address at the summit, he concentrated on his biography, touting his meeting with Richard Nixon as a college freshman, his adherence to Reagan's philosophy since before his 1982 election to the House, and his work on balancing budgets. He joked about his time as a Fox News host, saying he was a "giant television star."

He only returned to concrete policies only when outlining his fiscally conservative policies as governor and his willingness to leave a pathway to legal status for immigrants who are in the country illegally.

On taxes, too, he was firmer with Bloomberg. "The most important thing to do" for growth, he said, is not reform of the income tax code for individuals but "to give these companies incentive to invest instead of buying back stock and keeping their profits in Europe."

Despite making moves toward a run, Kasich also nearly shrugged off the ambition.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If I... get in, try my best, and I don't win, you know, I would have tried my best," he said.

And he couldn't resist making a comparison to state hero LeBron James, the Cleveland Cavaliers superstar who led his team to the NBA finals.

Both Buckeye Staters "want to take it to the hole and make sure you score," Kasich said. "Very competitive. Have fun too."

Kasich inches 'closer and closer' to 2016 decision // The Hill // Rebecca Shabad – June 12, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich (R) said Friday he's getting "closer and closer" to making a decision about whether to run for president.

"I wouldn't be out here if I wasn't interested, and we're getting closer and closer to making a decision. It's a discipline process because I don't want to do this just for the sake of it. I need to know that I could win and look at what I bring is a record that's unique," Kasich said in an interview on Fox Business Network.

Kasich expressed confidence he has the necessary qualifications to lead the White House by touting his records in Congress and as governor of Ohio on both defense and fiscal issues.

"I served on the Defense Committee. I was Chairman of the Budget Committee in Washington when we balanced the budget, and Ohio has had a massive turnaround, and I was in the private sector for 10 years. No one has all of that," he said.

Kasich predicted during the interview that critical votes on trade would pass in the House on Friday.

The lower chamber, however, later rejected a vote on a bill that would provide aid to workers who would be displaced by a future trade deal. A subsequent vote on fast-track authority that allows Congress to take an up or down vote on a trade deal, but not amend it, passed. It won't go to the president's desk because of a procedural rule.

The Ohio governor is hinting further at a 2016 run with a June 24 trip to the early-voting state of Iowa.

Kasich served in the House from 1983 until early 2001.

CARSON

Ben Carson polling well among millennials // Politico // Christina Animashaun – June 12, 2015

The Republican Party's most unlikely presidential candidate continues to defy the odds on the road to the GOP primary. But Ben Carson's campaign hopes may not survive if he tries to appeal to grass roots conservatives and tea partiers alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carson's presidential ambitions may compel him to ease the growing tension with children in Baltimore, who grew up knowing him as the one of world's greatest surgeons — or depending on the children, knowing very little about him at all.

We're talking about the millennials.

Last month, Carson topped the Harvard University's Institute of Politics millennial poll, a nationwide survey focused 18- to 29-year-olds. Though the poll did not present a clear GOP front-runner among that age set, the results showed Carson narrowly ahead of Rand Paul and Ted Cruz.

Millennials make up nearly a quarter of the U.S. population and currently outnumber the baby boomers, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. And with their voting participation on the rise, this group could become a crucial element in the 2016 election season.

Doug Watts, the communications director for Carson's 2016 presidential campaign, credits name recognition as the foundation of any candidate trying to win votes.

"The two sets of groups that seem to know Ben Carson really well [are] people 45 and older and people 18- to 24-year-olds," Watts said. "The younger voters know [a] lot more about Ben Carson than the general public. They were assigned [to] reading his books. They were aware of [his] story."

The retired neurosurgeon's first political splash came during his speech at the National Prayer Breakfast two years ago, where he doggedly embraced not being politically correct and criticized the Affordable Care Act as President Barack Obama sat only one seat from him.

But for Wake Tech political student Markeece Young, Carson's speech at the National Prayer Breakfast served as another first.

"That was the first time I learned who Ben Carson was," he said.

Known in the blogosphere as the Young Black Republican, Young is a political junkie. Scrolling through his Twitter stream reveals an unapologetic support for the GOP and pictures of him alongside Ted Cruz and Donald Trump.

Young watched Carson stumble on the campaign with political gaffes on gay rights issues. The 19-year-old activist attributes those blunders to Carson's political inexperience, but the candidate's bold statements have rubbed him and other millennial voters the wrong way by making light of issues most important to them, Young says.

"When he says he thinks selfies are stupid," Young said, "That is not how you start your youth outreach by downing something that is wildly popular in our culture."

Surprised that Carson is polling well among the millennial base, Young argued that voters his age tend to support flashier and more inexperienced candidates, such as Obama. Young, however, is not voting for Carson in the Republican primary because he doesn't believe Carson can resonate with youth as well as Paul or Cruz can.

"He hasn't been in any political or leadership positions already," Young said. "I think he needs more seasoning."

Carson is known for pulling himself up from the bootstraps in the face of heavy adversity growing up in Detroit.

Last month, the retired neurosurgeon visited with faith and community leaders in the wake of Freddie Gray's death in Baltimore, a city that is a marker of the Carson's historical success.

Ibrahim Auguste, a 21-year-old science major at the Community College of Baltimore County, had seen Carson several times in Auguste's years growing up in Baltimore. He stood in the crowded conference room of the Bilingual Christian Church, a 15-minute drive west of Johns Hopkins Hospital, where Carson served as director until 2013. He thought Carson's uplifting messages for city residents glided over the hard realities.

"People, in general, have been victims of racial prejudice and police brutality." Auguste said. Harvard's IOP poll shows that a large proportion of millennial voters are focused on the U.S. justice system and the #BlackLivesMatter movement. For Auguste, the GOP hopeful needs to identify systemic issues affecting his adopted hometown.

"Ah, man," Auguste said, recalling his thoughts when he listened to Carson speak. "You're really disconnected right now."

Kory Boone, chairman of the Maryland Young Republicans, knew of the neurosurgeon in the context of black history and his accomplishments in education. However, with a crowded field of GOP candidates, Boone believes Carson will have to step up even more if he hopes to improve his reach among younger voters.

"We need to stop being on the defensive when it comes to these issues, especially with millennials," Said Boone who said Republican candidates should campaign more on college campuses. "We need to articulate our message better. I believe that's what we need to do as a party."

Ben Carson: "What You See In Communist Countries" Is "What We've Got Now" In America // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 12, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson said Wednesday that regulations in the United States are akin to those in communist countries.

The retired neurosurgeon made the comments while answering a question by Iowa conservative radio show host Jan Mickelson on "Section 8 housing regulations" that allegedly stipulate that Eastern Iowans "have to recruit from Chicago their poverty-afflicted individuals to bring them to Iowa in order to qualify for Section 8 Housing."

Carson said the regulations were indicative of "what you see in communist countries."

"This is just an example of what happens when we allow the government to infiltrate every part of our lives," Carson said. "This is what you see in communist countries where they have so many regulations encircling every aspect of your life that if you don't agree with them, all they have to do is pull the noose. And this is what we've got now."

Carson argued that these "dozens of regulations" were part of a process that proves "exactly what Thomas Jefferson predicted."

"Every month dozens of regulations—business, industry, academia, every aspect of our lives—so that they can control you," Carson said. "And this is exactly what Thomas Jefferson predicted. He said the people would become lackadaisical, they would not be vigilant, the government would grow, it will infiltrate every part of their lives, and it will take over."

Carson finished his recounting of Jefferson's predictions by saying that "just before we become another type of government, the people would wake up."

“But just before—just before we become another type of government, the people would wake up,” he said. “I’m hoping that this is the time when they wake up.”

Ben Carson in Cleveland: Health care not a right, but a 'responsibility for a compassionate society' //
Cleveland News // Henry J. Gomez – June 12, 2015

Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon and Republican presidential candidate, used a medical conference here Friday to deliver his latest critique of President Barack Obama's signature health care program.

"The thing I really detested about the Affordable Care Act was you had government saying, 'We don't care what you, the people think. This is what you're going to do. End of story.' And that completely turns it on its head," Carson told more than 100 attendees at Cleveland Clinic Children's Pediatric Innovation Summit.

Carson, whose political identity soared after blasting Obamacare while the president sat nearby at the 2013 National Prayer Breakfast, added that he "very much wants people to have good health care." He also asserted that the U.S. spends "almost twice as much as the next closest nation on health care" -- a claim that the independent fact-checkers at PolitiFact found flaws with earlier this year.

"Is health care a right in this country? I don't believe so," Carson said at the close of his nearly 45-minute keynote speech, delivered at downtown's Global Center for Health Innovation. "But I believe it is a responsibility for a compassionate society. And we are a compassionate society. Physicians need to get involved. Five physicians signed the Declaration of Independence. ... We need to be the ones who drive this if we're going to be successful as a society."

Carson's speech had been relatively light on the politics until that point. For most of his time on stage he leaned comfortably on a lectern and delivered a conversational version of his life story. He grew up in poverty but went on to become a famed pediatric neurosurgeon at Baltimore's Johns Hopkins Hospital, where he was known for leading the first successful operation to separate twins joined at the head.

At times he sprinkled in pointed commentary.

"My mother worked extraordinarily hard, two three jobs at a time, getting up and leaving at 5 in the morning and getting back after midnight," Carson said. "The key thing for her is she never became a victim. She just didn't want to be dependent. She occasionally accepted some aid, but for the most part she stayed off of government aid. She didn't want us to feel like we were victims, either.

"I find it amusing that some people like to criticize me," he continued. "They say, 'Well, Carson grew up very poor, and he must have accepted government aid, so why does he want to withdraw it from people now?' Which is just total lies. I have no desire to withdraw aid from people who actually need it."

The speech was Carson's second public appearance in Cleveland in three months. He headlined the Cuyahoga County Republican Party's Lincoln Day dinner in April.

Carson is likely to return here Aug. 6, for the first GOP presidential debate, which Fox News will broadcast live from The Q. The cable network only will invite candidates who have averaged in the top 10 of recent national polls.

It's a threshold Carson should have little trouble meeting, based on his recent standings in the top third of a crowded field. But he has expressed concern about rules that could exclude Carly Fiorina, the only woman in the race, and others polling in the low single digits. This week, Fox News announced it will televise an afternoon forum for the candidates who don't qualify for the prime time debate.

"I'm happier with it than what they were doing before," Carson told the Northeast Ohio Media Group in an interview after his Friday speech. "I actually do think Carly will get there. I've known Carly for a long time. She's a smart cookie."

Cleveland also will host the 2016 Republican National Convention.

FIORINA

Carly Fiorina Shows Us Just How Weird America's Tax System Is // NYT // Josh Barro – June 12, 2015

Last week, Carly Fiorina's presidential campaign made an offer to reporters that was tantalizing to me, but probably to few other people on the planet: If we came in person to her campaign headquarters in Virginia, we could review her state income tax returns.

Ms. Fiorina had already put her and her husband's federal income taxes for 2012 and 2013 online, along with a disclosure of financial assets that is much more detailed than required by law. (Ms. Fiorina, a former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, and her husband have a net worth of precisely $58,954,494.88, according to her disclosure forms.) But I was mostly interested in the Fiorinas' state income tax returns because they demonstrate a distinct — and distinctly annoying — feature of American taxes: the way states clamber over one another, trying to tax the same income, often generating a lot of paperwork but not much revenue.

Mr. and Ms. Fiorina had to file taxes in no fewer than 17 states in 2013, many of them with only the most tenuous connection to the Fiorinas or their financial interests. In 11 of those states, their tax bill was less than $250.

Carly Fiorina at a campaign event in Iowa this month. Credit Dave Kaup/Reuters

Of course, the Fiorinas make more money than most people, about $2.5 million in 2013, which is a major reason they were taxed in so many states. But the tax rules that cause the Fiorinas to have around a 1,000-page stack of state income tax returns also hit many Americans with more moderate incomes, requiring them to file multiple state income tax returns.

In the Fiorinas' case, consider Michigan. The Fiorinas do not live or work in Michigan. They do not own a business or income-producing real estate there. Ms. Fiorina did not collect speaking fees from Michigan in 2013. But the Fiorinas do invest in a variety of funds, which generate income in a variety of places, including $946 in 2013 that was attributable to Michigan. So, the Fiorinas had to file a tax return there, which was 58 pages long, and reflects a liability of $40, which they paid.

And then they got the money back.

The Fiorinas' home state of Virginia gave them a tax credit of $40, fully offsetting the Michigan tax bill, because Virginia had already taxed the same income Michigan taxed. That's how the American system of state income taxes generally works: Your home state taxes you on all your income; states where you don't live tax you on the income you earned in those states; then, because some of your income has been taxed twice, your home state credits you back — but only up to the amount of tax you paid on that income in your home state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You don't have to pity the Fiorinas, who presumably did not sweat the cost of getting 17 state income tax returns prepared. But you don't have to be an ex-C.E.O. to get hit with an interstate tax burden.

For example, you could be me. I filed 2014 taxes in two states: New York, where I live and work; and California, where I once appeared on a television show (Fun fact: with Carly Fiorina). I owed $67 to California, and New York gave me back $55 as a credit. So nonresident income taxation cost me $12 in actual taxes, far less than the $40 I paid TurboTax to generate an additional state's return.

The more common reason to end up in this situation is cross-border commuting: If you live in one state and work in another, it's likely you're stuck with the obligation to file tax returns in multiple states, with little impact on your actual total tax payment.

There is not much justification for this complex structure, which is why other advanced countries generally do not emulate it. Many other rich countries do not have subnational income taxes at all. Those that do generally have a much simpler rule: You pay income tax where you live.

If Carly Fiorina were running for prime minister of Canada, there would have been no similar stack of provincial tax returns for me to page through. In Canada, you pay tax on all your personal income to whatever province you were a resident of on the last day of the year. Business income is only a little more complicated: You pay tax on business income in places where your business has a permanent establishment, not wherever you give a speech or have a consulting client. Switzerland is a country that prizes local government autonomy much as America does, but it also uses the Canadian pay-where-you-live model.

Some American states have figured that our system is convoluted and have established bilateral tax agreements to make it less so. Residents of Virginia who earn income in Maryland pay tax just to Virginia, and vice versa. But agreements like these don't exist everywhere.

Sometimes that's because there aren't enough taxpayers to justify negotiating the agreement: The Fiorinas' situation of living in Virginia and earning in Michigan is probably not very common. Sometimes it's because the fiscal benefits flow mostly in one direction: A lot more people live in New Jersey and earn income in New York than vice versa, so New York would lose revenue on a deal to simplify taxes for commuters.

Because of those parochial interests, tax harmonization tends to happen when it's enforced from above: Canada's last-day-of-the-year residency rule is imposed by its federal government. Do not hold your breath for a similar assertion of federal power here.

Carly Fiorina Blames Unions, Dodd Frank And Democrats For Gender Inequality // Think Progress // Alice Ollstein – June 12, 2015

On Thursday, former HP CEO and Republican presidential candidate Carly Fiorina told the DC-based libertarian think tank Competitive Enterprise Institute her views on the "state of women in America."

She spoke candidly about the sexism she has faced in her own career — including being called a "bimbo" multiple times, being forced to attend a corporate meeting held at a strip club, and being asked patronizing questions on the campaign trail. But Fiorina also insisted that the U.S. is the greatest country in the world for women.

"Women here have achieved more than anywhere else in the world," she told reporters on a conference call before the speech. She later told the audience, "My story — from secretary to CEO to candidate for President — is only possible in this country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The line won enthusiastic applause, but ignores the substantial list of countries where women have already risen from middle class backgrounds to running the country. Fiorina need only to look to Latin America to find, right now, former guerrilla fighter Dilma Rousseff as President of Brazil, former attorney Cristina Fernández de Kirchner as President of Argentina, and former political prisoner Michelle Bachelet as President of Chile. Decades ago, Margaret Thatcher, Benazir Bhutto and Indira Gandhi were elected to lead England, Pakistan and India, respectively. In more recent history, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf led Liberia and Han Myeong-sook led South Korea.

Looking beyond just the presidency, 97 other countries in the world have a higher percentage of women their national legislatures than the U.S. — which sits just behind Kenya and Indonesia, and only slightly ahead of the United Arab Emirates. At the pace the U.S. is going, researchers at the organization FairVote estimate the nation won't achieve gender equality in elected office for another 500 years.

Still, Fiorina insisted in her speech, "Women have more opportunities [here] than anywhere else on earth."

Again, the data does not support this claim.

Other countries, mainly in Northern Europe and just over the border in Canada, have much more equal representation in corporate boardrooms, largely because of diversity quotas written into law. In overall workforce participation, the U.S.' international ranking has been on a downward slide since 1999, mostly because they have not adopted the family leave and work/life balance policies favored by most of the world. In fact, out of 185 countries, the U.S. is one of just three that doesn't guarantee paid maternity leave.

Last year, France passed a sweeping gender equality law that not only set pay equality and provided both maternity and paternity leave, it fulls covers the cost of first-trimester abortions.

Fiorina, though she defined feminism on the press call as believing "every woman has the opportunity to choose their own life," is an outspoken opponent of abortion rights. She told reporters Thursday that if elected president she would support a ban on all abortions after 20 weeks, a bill pushed by Republicans in Congress many times, most recently this week.

While Fiorina did acknowledge the worsening gender pay gap in her speech, she told reporters she does not support current proposals, like the Paycheck Fairness Act, that would make it easier for women to discover and challenge pay discrimination.

"A woman is protected today by law from gender discrimination in her paycheck," Fiorina said. "She should use the law to its fullest extent. I think leading by example is far more important than imposing it on others, so I would reform the civil service so it becomes a meritocracy."

She also declined to support calls for better family leave policies, saying, "We need to be very careful not to overreach. When well-meaning legislation to help juggle work and family goes too far, it hurts women."

Instead, Fiorina faulted unions, Dodd Frank Wall Street reform, and economic policies from "the Left" for the current state of gender equality, vowing as President to go after all three. Yet the wage gap for unionized women is 40 percent smaller than that of non-unionized women. And while the wage gap has been shrinking among unionized workers, while the overall gap hasn't budged in a decade.

Fiorina's speech ended with a plea for the GOP to "reclaim" feminism, saying progressives have turned it "a left-leaning political ideology where women are pitted against men and used as a political weapon to win elections."

Yet she reminded the crowd: "If we as a party want to win, we have to win with women."

The RNC agrees, and after women helped propel President Obama to victory in two elections, they wrote about the need to "improve our brand with women throughout the country."

Neither the RNC nor Fiorina has called for backing policies that women overwhelmingly support, from raising the minimum wage to making all private employers cover birth control in their health insurance to legislating equal pay for equal work.

Two-year sentence for GOP operative convicted of illegal coordination // WaPo // Matt Zapotosky & Matea Gold

A former Republican political operative convicted in a first-ever federal criminal case of illegal coordination between a campaign and a purportedly independent ally was sentenced Friday to two years in prison — a lighter punishment than prosecutors sought but one that still served as a sharp warning.

Under questioning from U.S. District Judge Liam O'Grady, 34-year-old Tyler Harber said: "I'm guilty of this. I knew it was wrong when I did it." But Harber said he was not motivated by greed or a lust for power: he simply wanted to win an election and believed what he was doing was a common — if illegal — practice.

"I got caught up in what politics has become," Harber said.

Harber — who managed the unsuccessful 2012 congressional campaign of Virginia Republican Chris Perkins — admitted in February that he helped create a super PAC and arranged for it to buy $325,000 in ads to help Perkins's campaign, then lied to the FBI about his misdeeds. Federal prosecutors hailed Harber's guilty plea and sentence as "an important step forward in the criminal enforcement of federal campaign finance laws," and they indicated that they are ramping up scrutiny of the close ties between political campaigns and their ostensibly independent supporters.

The watershed prosecution comes as super PACs are playing increasingly prominent roles in national politics. Nearly all the 2016 White House contenders are being helped by outside groups run by their friends or former strategists — in many cases, operating in close proximity. But complaints about potentially illegal coordination have stalled before the Federal Election Commission, which is mired in partisan gridlock.

Top federal officials issued strong statements Friday warning that candidates and consultants should tread carefully as the 2016 race heats up.

Assistant Attorney General Leslie R. Caldwell said political operatives should "think twice about circumventing laws that promote transparency in federal elections" and encouraged party and campaign insiders to act as whistleblowers. In court, federal prosecutor Richard Pilger asked O'Grady to send Harber to prison for three years and 10 months, saying such a term would send a message to the campaign world that "how you win matters."

Harber's defense attorneys argued that a sentence of a year and eight months was more appropriate. They asserted that Harber, a married father of two, was already financially ruined and was unlikely to ever again work in the field where he was once a rising star.

"The whole thing is foolish, given the consequences to himself," defense attorney Shannon Quill said.

Though O'Grady's sentence was closer to defense attorneys' request than prosecutors', top election law attorneys said the aggressive stance by the Department of Justice should put donors and political consultants on guard.

"I think the department is trying to deliver a very clear message that it affirmatively wants to bring criminal coordination cases, and it is simply looking for the right opportunities to do so," said Robert Kelner, who heads the political law practice at Covington & Burling.

Kenneth Gross, a former associate general counsel at the FEC, called the department's posture "a shot across the bow."

"This shows they are willing to venture into areas of criminal enforcement in the 2016 election, beyond what they had done previously," Gross said.

In court, O'Grady peppered all those involved with critical inquiries. He asked Pilger detailed questions about the money involved in the scheme. He told Harber he did not understand what could have possibly motivated his crime, and wondered aloud why the operative did not simply have someone else take over the super PAC.

For his part, Harber repeatedly took responsibility for his actions, though he asserted he was motivated in-part by watching other people do the same things and get away with them. He said he started the super PAC — which he did not name, though federal records indicate was likely the National Republican Victory Fund — as a legitimate operation, then began using it nefariously to help Perkins campaign.

"It wasn't for greed; it wasn't for power," Harber said. "It was money in an attempt to win a race."

Perkins ultimately lost by a sizeable margin to Democratic incumbent Gerald E. Connolly to represent Virginia's 11th District in 2012.

In addition to admitting illegal coordination, Harber conceded that his super PAC — which was donor-funded — paid $138,000 to his mother's company for work that was never performed and used $118,000 of that cash for personal expenses.

Harber's sentencing comes as watchdog groups are appealing to the Justice Department to investigate such cases. Last month, Democracy 21 and the Campaign Legal Center called on the department to look into the ties between former Florida governor Jeb Bush and his associated super PAC.

But campaign finance lawyers noted that the facts in Harber's case were unusually clear-cut, involving a scheme to enrich himself and then lying to the FBI.

"It's an extreme case," said Anthony Herman, a former FEC general counsel. "I think it's quite possible that this may be unique, or one of a few we will see."

Still, Cleta Mitchell, a top Republican election law attorney, said that Harber's prosecution challenges the notion that there is no enforcement of campaign finance rules.

"It may take a while, and I wish the FEC could figure out a way to move things faster," she said. "But the law is still there and anybody who thinks it isn't proceeds at their own peril."

All those involved in Harber's case seemed keenly aware of the political climate. Prosecutors argued a significant punishment was necessary in-part because of the surge in spending by outside groups since the Supreme Court's 2010 Citizens United decision, which allowed corporations and unions to spend unlimited amounts independently on political activity. Quill referenced news reports about candidates delaying the announcement of their campaigns "so they don't fall under these rules."

O'Grady commented that he hoped conduct like Harber's was "not as rampant" as the former operative seemed to believe.

After the hearing, Harber declined to comment. He left the courtroom with his family and will report to prison at a later date.

Christie, Walker, Rubio are unsparing in blunt pitches to 2016 donors at Romney retreat // AP // Steve Peoples and Julie Bykowicz

Govs. Scott Walker and Chris Christie said presidential rivals in the Senate don't do anything. Sen. Marco Rubio denounced "old ways" in an indirect slap at older contenders. Sen. Lindsey Graham said his party may be going down a "death spiral" if it doesn't embrace minority and younger voters.

In elbowing for attention Friday at a luxury mountainside donor retreat convened by 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney, several 2016 contenders let loose some elbows at each other. Most did not name names, but Christie did.

"If you want to know how little they know," he said of senators, "watch what Rand Paul has done the last two weeks."

The existing and prospective presidential candidates employed some unusually blunt rhetoric in drawing contrasts with each other as they addressed the donors and activists.

Asked why senators seem to be popular as presidential candidates, Christie said, "Because they don't have to do anything."

"If you don't have to do anything you can be as popular as you like because you can say anything," the New Jersey governor went on. He then took his swing at Paul, the Kentucky senator who did not attend, for his tactics in the Senate that delayed and helped to reshape government surveillance programs.

Both Graham and another potential candidate, Ohio Gov. John Kasich, said the eventual nominee must get on board with an immigration overhaul or risk losing the presidency.

"Nobody is going to vote for a party that's going to break their family apart," Graham said. The South Carolina senator said the party's lost ground with minorities and younger voters means a "demographic death spiral."

Kasich also urged Republicans to accommodate many of the immigrants who are living in the country illegally. "They've been God-fearing, hard-working people in many cases," he said.

They were among the 2016 contenders pitching for the support of about 300 top political donors and strategists connected to Romney. Former technology executive Carly Fiorina is on Saturday's schedule — after a morning skeet-shooting session led by Graham.

Even while calling for a civilized Republican debate, Walker charged that GOP senators seeking the White House haven't accomplished anything in Washington.

He said his party's 2016 presidential class should be divided into two groups. "There are fighters and there are winners," the Wisconsin governor said, describing the fighters as the senators in the race.

"They have yet to win anything and accomplish anything."

Rubio did not engage Walker but drew a sharp contrast between the older and younger crop of candidates.

"Yesterday is over," the 44-year-old Florida senator declared, repeating a common theme designed to distinguish himself from leading Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton and Republican Jeb Bush. "The old ways of doing things aren't working anymore."

"Some have said I should have waited my turn," Rubio said. "I didn't know there was a line."

Bush was invited to Romney's gathering, but was in Europe on Friday.

Romney's invitation-only event gave the Republican contenders an opportunity to connect with 250 leading donors and political operatives.

Some attendees started their day hiking with Romney and his wife at 6 a.m. Others played flag football with Rubio. Among other activities: a hot air balloon ride, outdoor yoga and horseback riding with Ann Romney.

Sisterhood Is Sour: How Republican Women Are Going After Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg News // Emily Greenhouse – June 12, 2015

On Thursday night in Washington, Carly Fiorina, the only woman running for the Republican nomination, delivered the keynote address at a red-meat-themed event: the “Bourbon and BBQ Bash” held by the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a nonprofit that celebrates limited government and free markets. The tagline for the dinner read “Liberty served smooth and smokin’.”

Fiorina spoke about the years she spent as CEO at Hewlett-Packard, but her focus was not on business and the bottom line. It was on women: “a conversation,” in her words, “about the state of women in America.”

Fiorina has never before held elected office, and she may not yet make it into the prime time presidential debate.1 But by stressing her gender in her presidential campaign, Fiorina communicates to voters that there's an option beyond Hillary Clinton. “Fiorina has been trying to send a signal that Clinton is not your only choice if you want to see a woman break the highest, hardest glass ceiling,” observes Jennifer Lawless, the Director of the Women & Politics Institute at American University’s School of Public Affairs.

“Who else can take her on as a woman?”

Debbie Walsh, Center for American Women and Politics

This has become Fiorina's chief calling card at Republican candidate cattle calls. By speaking as a woman about a woman—and by defining herself against that woman—Fiorina finds, to the delight of her party, that she can criticize Clinton like nobody else.

In February, at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Maryland, Fiorina socked Clinton—who famously declared that “women's rights are human rights” at a United Nations conference 20 years ago—on her record on so-called women’s issues. “She tweets about women’s rights in this country and takes money from governments that deny women the most basic human rights,” Fiorina said of the former secretary of state, referring to donations the Clinton Family Foundation took from foreign donors. “She tweets about equal pay for women but won’t answer basic questions about her own offices’ pay standards.” She went on to challenge Clinton's history and her impressive résumé, booming on the CPAC stage, “Mrs. Clinton, name an accomplishment!”

In Fiorina's stump speech, she speaks movingly of surviving breast cancer, of losing her job, and of losing her stepdaughter—displays of vulnerability that show strength, which some might call a historically female strategy. (They certainly ring of a TED Talk by a woman who has read Brené Brown.) But a remarkable amount of her discourse centers on gender. Fiorina's labor to find her place within the GOP tent also means finding space for feminism within the GOP. This is savvy as well as palatable. She uses her platform to criticize the woman who has come closest to the American presidency, opposing Clinton in ways and in terms that a man wouldn't dare.

Subtly and not-so-subtly, Fiorina is making the case that she's the politician best positioned to confront the Democrat most likely to win her party's nomination. “Who else can take her on as a woman?” asked Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University.

In Fiorina's speech Thursday, a personal reflection about being a woman in America, Clinton's name went unuttered. But a day earlier, the super-PAC Carly For America released a biting ad attacking Clinton. The title employed one of Fiorina's favorite refrains: “Titles are not accomplishments.”

Campaign trailing

Fiorina challenges Clinton inch by inch and step by step. Clinton officially entered the presidential race, and all of a sudden came Fiorina's antagonistic video in response. Fiorina goes after Clinton on everything, as Bloomberg’s Melinda Henneberger has written, “from conflicts of interest to wearing her sunglasses inside that Chipotle.” Fiorina even launched a campaign website at Ready to Beat Hillary.com—a push to undermine the 'Ready for Hillary' movement.

In late May, Fiorina held a news conference outside a Clinton event in South Carolina. She listed scandal after scandal, then asked, “How can we trust Clinton?”

It looked almost like stalking, then pouncing; that ugly word 'catfight' enters the mind. Could this be anything but a transparent attempt to grab the attention of the massive press entourage that accompanies Clinton wherever she goes? Fiorina was absolute in her response. She told reporters, “I planned this trip many, many weeks ago, so perhaps she’s following me. I have never been following Mrs. Clinton.”

And yet it's not only in South Carolina that Fiorina's proximity with Clinton has been noticeable, as Nia-Malika Henderson has pointed out in the Washington Post. Just take a look at the women's book covers:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is the new playbook for women in the GOP, and Fiorina's not the only one to read it. Last weekend at the inaugural “Roast and Ride,” Iowa Senator Joni Ernst played host to a slate of Republican presidential candidates, and shepherded a parade of 300 motorcycles, in honor of patriots and veterans. Revved up, roaring, and real down-home: here was a new kind of political carnival. Then Dana Bash of CNN asked her about Hillary.

“It's not enough to be a woman,” she said. If those words sounded familiar, there was a reason.

Last fall, before the midterm elections, Clinton, not yet a presidential candidate, went to Cedar Rapids to campaign on behalf of Ernst's Democratic opponent, Bruce Braley. She took up women’s issues, which were getting an unusual amount of play in the campaign. “It’s not enough to be a woman,” Clinton said, behind the podium at a union hall. She spoke of birth control, mammograms, health and reproductive justice. “You have to be committed to expand rights and opportunities for all women.”

This weekend, Ernst mockingly echoed Clinton. “You have to care about women's issues,” Ernst said. “Women's issues here in Iowa are that we have a strong economy; we have jobs that our sons and daughters can go off to someday; we have a great educational system. And women want strong national defense. We want to know that our families are going to be safe.”

Diminished fraternity among the sorority

It wasn’t always this way. Walsh of the Center for American Women and Politics recalls a period where “the women in the Senate had a kind of agreement among themselves that they would not go in and campaign against each other.” Barbara Mikulski, the first Democratic woman elected to the Senate who wasn’t taking her father or husband’s seat, has long worked to build relationships among women in the Senate, hosting dinners and “power workshops” for female senators on both sides of the aisle. Mikulski and Texas Senator Kay Bailey Hutchinson, a Republican, have worked together to improve breast cancer research, mammogram standards, and the space program. After the death of Geraldine Ferraro, the Democrat who in 1984 became first woman to be placed on a major party’s national ticket, Hutchinson spoke in universal terms, saying, “We’ve all faced the same obstacles. We’ve all been turned down or trivialized.”

More recently, when Nancy Pelosi became the first female Speaker of the House in 2007, under President George W. Bush, there was bipartisan praise from female politicians.

When the Obama presidential campaign asked Hillary Clinton to go after Sarah Palin in 2008, after the former governor of Alaska was tapped to be Senator John McCain’s running mate, Clinton refused. “The day she was nominated, the Obama campaign did contact me and asked me if I would attack her," Clinton said last year on NBC. “I said, ‘Attack her for what—for being a woman? Attack her for being on a ticket that's trying to draw attention? There'll be plenty of time to do what I think you should do in politics, which is draw distinctions.’”

It’s hard to imagine such a display of female solidarity now. Even Fiorina herself has evinced a change in tone. In 2010, she told Amy Chozick, then reporting for the Wall Street Journal, “Women are still held to a different standard and scrutinized more than men are.” She said that it happened to Sarah Palin. She said, “It happened to Hillary.” A kind of empathy, or even sympathy.

And then this April, Fiorina said, “Hillary Clinton must not be president of the United States—but not because she’s a woman.”

Some of this has to do with the success Democrats had using the 'war on women' as a rallying cry against Republicans in 2012. In the run-up to the 2016 election, the GOP has caught on. Republicans are working to claim the trope as its own, with the bellicose Fiorina in the front lines.

Ann Selzer, an Iowa pollster—who was assigned to a fellowship in Mikulski's congressional office in the early 1980s, before Mikulski began her many terms in the Senate—speculates that Fiorina might have looked at poll numbers for 2008, when Clinton opposed then-senator Barack Obama in the primary, and saw that Clinton had captured the excitement of women who wanted to have a female president. "The Republicans have a woman problem," Selzer put it. "So as a Republican, Fiorina says, maybe there's some people I can bring in. Because if Republicans deal with the woman problem—even a bit—they win."

Party before gender

Jennifer Lawless of American University's Women & Politics Institute chalks it up to polarization. "I think that what we've seen, especially in the last ten or fifteen years is that, with this increase in party politicization, whether you have a D or R before your name is far more important than whether you have an X or Y chromosome," she said.

In the 1980s and 1990s, not only were there fewer women in Congress, but there were significant number of moderate Republican women. After redistricting, Lawless explained, moderate Republicans were replaced by Democrats. "There used to be room for solidarity and working together on what was traditionally seen as women's issues – pay equity or reproductive rights. But now, the Republican women in congress are indistinguishable from men who are in Congress. There's very little opportunity to work across the aisle just because you're a woman."

There's the added bonus, for Fiorina and Ernst, that criticism "is seen as less gendered because it's a woman saying it about another woman. If men were saying it, it could be seen as gendered/sexist," said Walsh. (Recall that Clinton's team worked to portray her 2000 Senate rival Rick Lazio as a sexist bully—with positive results for her.)

Walsh observed the play of gender among Republican women, the boasting of behavior that's often seen as masculine—Ernst rides a motorcycle alongside (and in front of) the guys, Fiorina trumpets her time riding on a John Deere tractor (and questions whether Clinton's ever done the same). Walsh wondered whether, in this climate of women-attacking-women, they would still defend each other from blatant sexism.

"So sad to see women simply attack Clinton for running when we need more women in the proverbial pipeline," Donna Brazile, a Democratic political strategist, lamented. "If they could just stop their attacks and start recruiting more women to run for office, we could finally end up with more women serving in office."

A year ago this week, Palin tweeted a picture of an excerpt from Clinton's memoir, in which Clinton wrote, "I was not going to attack Palin just for being a woman appealing for support from other women. I didn't think that made political sense."

Now that a woman is the frontrunner, maybe it does.

Mitt Romney And Republican Presidential Hopefuls: All One And The Same! // Correct The Record – June 12, 2015

Today, Mitt Romney will welcome six Republican hopefuls including Marco Rubio, Scott Walker and Lindsey Graham to his conclave in Utah to audition for his support. One may ask – why are these potential Republican candidates elbowing each other to win the backing of a failed presidential candidate who purposefully sought to exclude 47% of America?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The truth is that this cycle's Republican hopefuls are nearly indistinguishable from Mitt Romney when it comes to their policies on issues affecting women, LGBT rights, and how to grow the economy. Marco Rubio, Scott Walker and Lindsey Graham have the same botched, cookie cutter, last-century policy visions benefitting only the wealthiest of Americans. These extremist positions haven't worked for Americans in the past and won't work in the future.

If Mitt Romney and the Republican party failed in 2012, why is the GOP chasing after Romney's endorsement in 2016? Instead of adapting to advocate for the interests of all Americans, Republicans are proud to show that they're still all one and the same.

Chinese hack compromised security-clearance database // WaPo // Ellen Nakashima – June 12, 2015

The Chinese breach of the Office of Personnel Management network was wider than first acknowledged, and officials said Friday that a database holding sensitive security clearance information on millions of federal employees and contractors also was compromised.

In an announcement, the OPM said that investigators concluded this week with "a high degree of confidence" that the agency's systems containing information related to the background investigations of "current, former and prospective" federal employees, and others for whom a background check was conducted, were breached.

The OPM is assessing how many people were affected, spokesman Samuel Schumach said. "Once we have conclusive information about the breach, we will announce a notification plan for individuals whose information is determined to have been compromised," he said.

The announcement of the hack of the security-clearance database comes a week after the OPM disclosed that another personnel system had been compromised. The discovery of the first breach led investigators to find the second — all part of one campaign by the Chinese, U.S. officials say, evidently to obtain information valuable to counterespionage.

"This is potentially devastating from a counterintelligence point of view," said Joel Brenner, a former top counter-intelligence official for the U.S. government, speaking about the latest revelation. "These forums contain decades of personal information about people with clearances . . . which makes them easier to recruit for foreign espionage on behalf of a foreign country."

Last week, the OPM announced that a database containing the personal information of about 4 million current and former federal employees was hacked. Privately, U.S. officials said the Chinese government was behind the breach. The administration has not publicly pointed a finger at Beijing.

The breach of that data system affected 4.1 million individuals — all 2.1 million current federal civilian employees and 2 million retired or former employees. Information on officials as senior as Cabinet secretaries may have been breached. The president's and vice president's data were not, officials said.

China has dismissed the hacking allegations, with a Foreign Ministry spokesman last week calling them "irresponsible and unscientific."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The separate background-check database contains sensitive information — called SF-86 data — that includes applicants' financial histories and investment records, children's and relatives' names, foreign trips taken and contacts with foreign nationals, past residences, and names of neighbors and close friends.

That database was also breached last year by the Chinese in a separate incident, and the new intrusion underscores how persistent and determined Beijing is in going after data valuable to counterespionage.

"The adversary is obviously very interested in that data," said a U.S. official, who, like several others who were interviewed, spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

The discovery of the second compromise was not exactly a surprise. "It's like cancer," a second U.S. official said. "Once you start operating on the cancer, you find it has spread to other areas of the body."

Employees of intelligence agencies, such as the CIA, generally do not have the records of their clearance checks held by the OPM, although some do, officials said.

"That's the open question — whether it's going to hit CIA folks," the second official said. "It would be a huge deal. They could start unmasking identities."

Matthew Olsen, a former National Security Agency general counsel and former head of the National Counter-terrorism Center, said the breach is "truly significant." The data can be used in many different ways to target people, "whether it's blackmail, to recruit, to punish individuals in China who are connected to people in the United States."

In the past year or two, the Chinese government has begun building massive databases of Americans' personal information obtained through cyberespionage. Besides the series of OPM intrusions, a federal government contractor that conducted background investigations for the OPM and the Department of Homeland Security was hacked last year by the Chinese. And Beijing has been linked to penetrations of several health insurance companies that hold personal data on tens of millions of Americans.

"Who can be surprised?" Brenner said. "They're making a concerted effort to gather vast quantities of information about Americans. This is perfectly clear. That they have all this clearance information is a disaster."

President Obama, as with previous high-profile breaches, has been briefed on the investigation. What steps, if any, the administration can or should take in response is a difficult discussion, current and former officials said.

"There are a whole array of things we need to do across the board, from raising our defenses to making sure that this stuff isn't actually on the criminal underground to understanding the full scope" of the breach, the first official said. "We haven't gotten there yet."

What complicates this case is that unlike many other Chinese breaches of U.S. networks, the OPM hacks do not involve theft of commercial secrets. Last year, the United States indicted five Chinese military officials on charges of commercial cyberespionage. With traditional espionage, the options are fewer.

"You're not going to start a shooting war over this," a former intelligence official said. "We need to improve our defenses. We also want to go on the offense."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Offensive actions might include directing a U.S. agency to locate the servers holding the stolen data and deleting or altering the data, the former official said.

The administration timed its announcement last week of the initial OPM breach to comply with its own policy, as reflected in proposed legislation, to notify individuals of a breach within 30 days of concluding that there is a "reasonable basis to believe" that personal information has been compromised, the first U.S. official said.

Although the breach was discovered in April, it was not until early May that investigators determined that employees' personal data probably was taken. That led to the announcement last week even though, the official said, the investigation was not complete.

During a briefing for congressional staff last week, Ann Barron-DiCamillo, a senior DHS official, tried to explain the delay in alerting employees to the breach. "It takes time to do the forensics and to understand what's happened, and even to understand what data, if any, has been exposed," she said, according to notes taken by a congressional aide.

The breach, she said, took place in December. "It took awhile to pinpoint what actually went out the door because it happened six months ago," she said.

House Deals Blow to Obama's Bid for Trade Deal, Rejects Worker-Aid Program // WSJ // Siobhan Hughes, Kristina Peterson & William Mauldin – June 12, 2015

House Democrats dealt President Barack Obama a major setback in his bid for expanded trade-negotiating powers, roundly rejecting on Friday a workers-aid program that was a key component of the bill and leaving the White House's trade agenda in limbo.

While stinging, the vote was not the last word in the trade fight, as House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio) said there would be a re-vote by Tuesday on extending the aid program, which is designed to help workers hurt by international trade.

But Friday's defeat showed the degree to which Mr. Obama's trade agenda is on shaky ground in Congress. The House voted against the workers-aid program by 126-302. To improve those numbers, House Republican leaders, the White House and pro-trade businesses will need to find ways to win over a combination of Democrats who are skeptical of the overall trade push and Republicans leery of supporting the aid package.

It also underscored the waning influence of a second-term president, particularly on an issue many Democrats see as toxic to their re-election prospects, given concerns in their districts that U.S. jobs are being sent overseas.

Mr. Obama, who traveled to Capitol Hill on Friday morning, and to a charity congressional baseball game the night before, made impassioned pleas to members of his party to support "fast track," which gives the president the ability to submit trade deals to Congress for an up-or-down vote without amending it.

Mr. Boehner said after the vote that the onus was on Democrats to devise a way forward.

"Republicans did our part, and we remain committed to free trade because it is critical to creating jobs and growing our economy. I'm pleased that a bipartisan House majority supported trade promotion authority," Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boehner said, referring to a separate vote on fast track on Friday.

Democrats' ability to take down the trade bill was made possible by House Republican leaders' decision to hold two separate votes on the legislation that was passed by the Senate last month. The calculus was that Democratic votes on the first part, the workers-aid program, would compensate for opposition from Republicans. GOP votes for fast track, meanwhile, would offset Democratic opposition there.

Instead, Democrats abandoned the first part in droves, raising questions about whether they would be any more supportive next week. While most of them support the workers-aid measure, they knew its rejection would take down the fast-track bill.

"Its defeat, sad to say, is the only way that we would be able to slow down the fast track," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.), who ended months of neutrality to side with liberals who voted against the worker-aid program as a way to sink Mr. Obama's trade agenda.

Derailing fast track, even temporarily, further strains the negotiations that the U.S. is trying to wrap up with 11 countries around the Pacific, including Australia, Japan and Vietnam. Discernible progress on the remaining difficult issues in the deal, the Trans-Pacific Partnership, or TPP, has all but halted recently as officials from U.S. trading partners wait for Congress to act on fast-track legislation, which is also known as trade promotion authority.

"Unless this is promptly remedied with an affirmative vote cast soon, it is doubtful that TPP partners will be willing to seriously re-engage," said Daniel Price, former economic adviser to President George W. Bush and managing director at Rock Creek Global Advisers, a consultancy.

The coming days are expected to include a new frenzy of lobbying by both sides, as Mr. Obama and his allies on trade get a second chance. There were signs on Friday of potential horse trades. Mrs. Pelosi said prospects for passage of a fast-track bill would "greatly increase" if bolstered by another Democratic priority, such as a "robust highway bill."

Congress has for years been unable to pass a multiyear highway bill, and a current short-term bill expires at the end of July. The White House and Democrats have long pushed for a multiyear bill, which many see as essential to completing long-term infrastructure projects that will also boost jobs.

Pro-trade House lawmakers also have another key piece of ammunition as they enter weekend negotiations: The House voted 219-211 on the second part of the bill, granting Mr. Obama fast-track authority. It drew the support of 28 Democrats, more than expected. Pro-trade House lawmakers also secured passage of a separate customs and enforcement measure that includes new tools to combat unfair trade practices.

After the vote, Mr. Obama urged the House to act quickly.

"These kinds of agreements make sure that the global economy's rules aren't written by countries like China; they're written by the United States of America," Mr. Obama said in a statement. "And to stand in their way is to do nothing but preserve the long-term status quo for American workers, and make it even harder for them to succeed."

White House spokesman Josh Earnest dismissed the defeat of the worker-aid program as a "procedural snafu," the same words he had used to describe an earlier, temporary defeat in the Senate on the fast-track bill.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the House has long been more suspicious of trade deals, and the stall in the House represented a more personal blow because Mr. Obama had courted Mrs. Pelosi assiduously, showing up at the congressional baseball game and meeting with her personally on Friday morning before making a rare, last-minute visit to the Capitol to urge Democrats to "play it straight" and vote for the piece of the bill that would extend the workers-aid program.

Mr. Obama has promised that he would support Democrats in the face of expected attacks from labor unions opposed to fast-track legislation. Some Democrats said that was not enough.

"I don't know if it's a matter of just hearing from the president," said Rep. Danny Davis (D., Ill). "I would need to hear from the people in the Seventh Congressional District in Illinois."

Mr. Obama's call to "play it straight" was a bitter pill for House liberals, who thought House leaders had already been devious by establishing the two-step procedure.

As it became clear that House Republican leaders and Mr. Obama had lined up enough support to win passage of the portion of the bill granting fast-track negotiating power, liberals saw only one choice: to vote against the worker-aid portion of the bill even though it helped many of their own constituents, workers who lose jobs as a result of international trade.

"It was not the opponents who came up with this crazy procedure. If they had played it straight, we could play it straight," said Rep. Brad Sherman (D., Calif.). "What's the good of having a little bit of trade-adjustment assistance if we lose millions of jobs because we put them on a fast track to Asia?"

White House trade push not getting help from DNC // Politico // Edward-Isaac Dovere – June 12, 2015

Texas Democratic Party chair Gilberto Hinojosa had just put out a statement opposing President Barack Obama's trade platform when his cell phone starting flashing with a blocked number. He assumed White House political director David Simas was calling to ask him to stop.

Hinojosa didn't pick up.

"What was he going to do? We're pretty firm on our opposition to this," Hinojosa recalled in an interview. "This is an issue very important to labor and environmentalists, and the Texas Democratic Party has a very strong connection to labor, as does the Democratic National Committee."

As Obama and his aides make the final push for votes during a trade showdown in the House, they are getting little help from the Democratic party apparatus — the Democratic National Committee, state parties or even smaller Democratic groups.

It's not just that Democratic officials are sitting on their hands: 19 state parties are actively opposing the president's trade package, passing resolutions against fast-track authority and the Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement the president wants to finish negotiating once that's in place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

White House officials argue that this is a case of Democratic institutions — including Democratic lawmakers facing a make-or-break vote on the trade agenda on Friday — being out of sync with actual Democratic voters.

"There's a profound disconnect between where Democratic voters are today versus where they were even five, six years ago—the most pro-trade voters in the country are Democratic voters," Simas said. Within the Democratic coalition, he added, "there are large majorities that are now in favor of trade."

Recent polls back him up. A May poll by the non-partisan Pew Research Center found that 58 percent of Democrats said free trade agreements are good for the country, while just 33 percent described them as bad. Support for trade deals has rebounded among Democrats since the 2008 recession, when only 34 percent of Democrats described them as "a good thing" and 50 percent said they were bad.

But the White House hasn't had much luck getting backing from party organizations. Obama aides started out trying to make the progressive argument for trade, then retrenched to trying to get Democratic groups to at least stay neutral. That didn't always work.

The DNC, which would normally provide support for a Democratic president, hasn't backed him up in any public way, choosing to stay out of the fight. (DNC chair Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) has yet to take a position ahead of Friday's vote.)

"We understand and the White House understands that there is and has been a diversity of views within the party on this issue for a long time, which we respect, and that is unlikely to change," said DNC press secretary Holly Shulman. "Our role has simply been to give the White House opportunities to give information and answer questions from our members and state parties."

That included a May call with state party chairs in which Simas presented the pro-trade argument and answered questions. When word got out about that call, labor representatives got the DNC to put together a separate call with the same group to rebut the White House.

The White House argues that it wasn't trying to get people to any set position on trade, or under the impression that putting the information out would directly influence votes on the Hill.

"There's zero bank-shot," Simas said. "This was about, and was executed as, giving information to folks at the DNC and others who didn't have the information, or our perspective as to why the president was doing what he's doing, and why it's so important."

Being on the other side of the president, Hinojosa said, is painful. But nothing Obama has said was enough to convince Democrats in Texas to trust him on this.

"It's not so much that we don't trust him. We trust him with our lives. What we don't trust is some of the multinational corporations," he explained.

Party officials said that a major factor in their decision to not to support the president on trade is organized labor, which has spent a lot of time and money cultivating state-level Democratic officials.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“As goes organized labor in America, so does the Democratic Party — especially state parties,” said Jason Perkey, the executive director of the South Carolina Democrats and president of the Association of State Democratic Party Executive Directors. “They are our strongest allies and most steadfast supporters, year in and year out.”

In late April, the South Carolina Democratic Party nearly passed a resolution strongly opposing the president’s trade agenda, before it was stopped by a procedural maneuver initiated by former DNC chair Don Fowler, who ran the national party during Bill Clinton’s first term. Fowler made two arguments: the people pushing the resolution didn’t have all the information, and the Democratic president deserved the support of the state Democratic Party.

The “stand-with-the-president” argument hasn’t worked in other states. In Maine, state Democratic chair Phil Bartlett said he made the case to the executive committee himself, along with some of the arguments that he’d heard from the White House. But they passed a resolution against fast-track trade authority in mid-May anyway. Bartlett said he knows that the White House would have preferred they hadn’t.

“I understand their position wanting us to sort of keep quiet. From our perspective, once you have so many Democratic leaders from across the country speaking out, including our elected leaders, it becomes much more an issue of whether it’s appropriate for us to weigh in,” he said. “We didn’t view it as being an effort to insult and push back against the president.”

While mayors across the country have formed perhaps the strongest bloc of support for Obama on fast track, a number of local Democratic organizations and majority-Democratic city councils have passed their own anti-trade resolutions, including in Seattle and San Francisco (where Democratic Mayor Ed Lee supports fast-track).

Meanwhile, the president’s also getting limited support from what’s left of his own Organizing for Action group, despite an impassioned speech to their conference in Washington at the end of April, asking them and others to trust him when he said the new trade deals would fit completely with his record of watching out for working people.

A news release from OFA showed three women in a lobby holding signs, waiting to see their local representatives and the lead volunteer in Washington State at her computer, writing a letter to the editor.

“Trade policy is a hot topic on OFA’s digital organizing platform Connect,” the release noted.

Some state officials insist that the polls don’t reflect Democratic opinion in their states.

“It’s easy to characterize this as simply a labor issue, but this is deeper for our state than one group of stakeholders,” said David Pepper, the chair of the Ohio Democratic Party, which was the first to pass an anti-TPA resolution.

Contrary to the numbers the White House cites, Pepper said he’d had conversations with people all over the state still complaining about NAFTA and worried about the secrecy surrounding the Pacific trade pact. In his experience, there’s no disconnect between the Democratic organizations opposed to TPA and the voters.

“In Ohio, you go town to town, and you will find deep concerns about the negative consequences of past trade deals, lessons not learned, and real concern about this as well,” Pepper said. “I have little doubt that in Ohio at least, those speaking out against it are representing their districts well.”

ISIS Is Winning the Social Media War, U.S. Concludes // NYT // Mark Mazzetti & Michael Gordon – June 12, 2015

An internal State Department assessment paints a dismal picture of the efforts by the Obama administration and its foreign allies to combat the Islamic State's message machine, portraying a fractured coalition that cannot get its own message straight.

The assessment comes months after the State Department signaled that it was planning to energize its social media campaign against the militant group. It concludes, however, that the Islamic State's violent narrative — promulgated through thousands of messages each day — has effectively "trumped" the efforts of some of the world's richest and most technologically advanced nations.

It also casts an unflattering light on internal discussions between American officials and some of their closest allies in the military campaign against the militants. A "messaging working group" of officials from the United States, Britain and the United Arab Emirates, the memo says, "has not really come together."

Document: State Department Memo on the Islamic State Group

The blunt assessment comes amid broader criticism that the military campaign against the Islamic State is flagging. The group's fighters recently took over the city of Ramadi in western Iraq and have occupied Falluja and Mosul for more than a year.

State Department officials have repeatedly said that "countermessaging" the Islamic State is one of the pillars of the strategy to defeat the group. But Obama administration officials have acknowledged in the past that the group is far more nimble in spreading its message than the United States is in blunting it.

The internal document — composed by Richard A. Stengel, the State Department's under secretary for public diplomacy and public affairs and a former managing editor of Time magazine — was written for Secretary of State John Kerry after a conference of Western and Arab officials in Paris this month on countering the Islamic State.

A communiqué issued at the meeting took note of the Islamic State's gains and expressed the coalition's determination to remove the group from the territory it held in Iraq and Syria. The document was issued in the name of Mr. Kerry, Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius of France and Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi of Iraq. Mr. Kerry was in Boston recuperating from a broken leg, but he spoke to the meeting by phone.

Mr. Stengel noted that the message from the conference — that a disparate coalition of nations was resolute in destroying the Islamic State — fell flat, with news media reports highlighting how little of substance seemed to emerge from the meeting.

"From the outside, it mostly seemed exactly like business as usual," he wrote.

The memo, labeled "sensitive but unclassified," was given to The New York Times by an Obama administration official.

Mr. Stengel did not respond to a request for comment. John Kirby, the State Department spokesman, said that the memo "acknowledges what we've made clear in the past: We must do a better job at discrediting ISIL in the information space." Mr. Kirby was using an acronym for an alternate name for the group, the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The memo is an assessment not of the larger counter-ISIL messaging effort, but how the small group of coalition members communicates internally and externally," Mr. Kirby said, adding that Mr. Kerry would "take into consideration" Mr. Stengel's ideas and recommendations.

Spokesmen for the British and Emirati Embassies in Washington declined to comment.

This year, administration officials said they planned to expand the State Department's Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications, a tiny office created in 2011 to combat terrorist messages on the Internet in real time. The center employs specialists fluent in Arabic, Urdu, Punjabi and Somali to counter terrorist propaganda and misinformation, offering a competing narrative that seeks to strike an emotional chord. The analysts also post messages on English-language websites that jihadists use to recruit, raise money and promote their cause.

Mr. Stengel has also sought to work with other coalition members, particularly Arab ones, to discredit the Islamic State in the hope of stemming the flow of foreign fighters to the group. Mr. Kerry has said that the effort to "start drying up this pool" of potential volunteers may be even more important than military efforts.

When Mr. Kerry traveled to the Middle East in September to start building a coalition against the Islamic State, Mr. Stengel went with him to meet with Arab officials and establish what he called "a communications coalition, a messaging coalition, to complement what's going on the ground."

A crucial part of the public diplomacy has involved encouraging Arab religious leaders, Muslim scholars and Arab news media organizations to denounce the Islamic State as a distortion of Islam. State Department officials have praised the United Arab Emirates for establishing its own center to counter the Islamic State's prodigious propaganda.

But Mr. Stengel's assessment makes clear that American officials believe that much more needs to be done.

In the memo, he proposes to Mr. Kerry that a "communications hub" be created somewhere in the Middle East — staffed by representatives from the various coalition members — that would perform "daily and weekly messaging around coalition activities" to fight the Islamic State, and that would have a spokesman in Baghdad.

But even this, he said, would face hurdles.

"This seems like an obvious and simple solution — but I am sure it is not as easy as it sounds for a hundred different reasons," he wrote.

Still, Mr. Stengel did have one piece of good news for Mr. Kerry from the Paris conference. An event at the Louvre intended to focus on the Islamic State's destruction of antiquities in Syria and Iraq, Mr. Stengel said, was a success and could be followed up with an entire conference on the issue.

The conference, he wrote, could bring together "dealers, auction houses, collectors, scholars" and others to highlight that trafficking in antiquities is a "war crime" and a "tool of terrorism," and is financing the Islamic State's "dark game."

U.S., Europe ready new sanctions to deter Putin on Ukraine // CNN // Elise Labott – June 12, 2015

he United States and the European Union are finalizing further sanctions against Russia that could be imposed if Moscow takes additional military action in Ukraine, senior U.S. administration officials and European diplomats said Thursday.

The sources stressed that no decisions have been made yet to put additional measures in place. This week's renewed fighting triggered a discussion of additional sanctions, they said, but the fighting ended before a decision to act was made.

The sources said the potential new measures to be presented to Western leaders range from adding names and companies to the current sanctions to imposing broader penalties on Russia's financial, energy and defense sectors.

The point at which Russian military moves would prompt new sanctions is a case of "you know it when you see it," a senior administration official said. "It could be any major assault anywhere across the line of contact. We all know what we are talking about, and we want to be prepared and have stuff ready to go in case we need it."

"There is a whole range of different options leaders will have available to respond to any renewed Russian aggression, to which we could respond pretty quickly and vigorously. We are not talking about weeks," the official said.

Discussion of additional sanctions comes as the EU is widely expected to renew trade and personal sanctions on Russia over its actions in Ukraine when they expire toward the end of the month.

Both the U.S. and EU have linked the lifting of sanctions to implementation of a peace accord hammered out in February by Russia with the leaders of Ukraine, France and Germany in the capital of Belarus.

The so-called Minsk Agreement has been repeatedly violated. The U.S. and EU claim that most of those violations were by Russia and the separatists it supports. Some of the fiercest fighting since the agreement came this week, with heavy artillery fire reported near Donetsk.

The European parliament passed a resolution calling on EU governments to keep the measures in place after Russian President Vladimir Putin traveled to Italy Wednesday in what many in the West saw as a bid to break European solidarity on the sanctions.

"Europe has acted with more unity than most people expected, including Putin himself," one of the senior administration officials said.

A European diplomat briefing reporters Thursday noted that this week's violence strengthened European resolve to maintain the current measures.

"The concerns that we all began to feel about additional violations and suggestions there were troops and equipment coming across the border from Russia ... all that in fact was quite useful in getting European nations collectively to grasp that now is not the time to start softening the position we are taking on sanctions," the European diplomat said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Barack Obama said in Austria on Monday that he'd convinced European leaders to maintain the economic sanctions. The extension of sanctions was one of his chief goals at this week's G7 meeting in the Bavarian Alps. Obama said Europe and the United States stand ready to impose new sanctions if violence increases.

The sources said that while they prefer not to impose the new sanctions, they hope the knowledge that they are being prepared will deter Putin from taking further action.

"It is both preparation and also a degree of credible messaging," the European diplomat briefing reporters said. "One is to make very clear that if there are further acts of aggression that we can move quickly. The other is to let it be known we are serious about being ready to do that as a deterrent."

The diplomat stressed, "We would rather not to have to do that, but it needs to be clear that if that is the direction Putin's Russia goes in, that we will react."

U.S. officials and European diplomats insist the sanctions are taking a toll on the Russian economy, where the ruble has plummeted in value.

But they admit the sanctions have done little to prevent Putin from continuing the campaign in Ukraine or curb aggression by separatists in Eastern Ukraine.

In total, more than 6,000 people have died in the fighting in Eastern Ukraine since the conflict began last year, according to the United Nations.

Shut Up About the Clinton Foundation's Problems for a Minute to Look at Its Programs // Inside Philanthropy // Kiersten Marek and David Callahan – June 12, 2015

With all the hype in the media about the Clinton Foundation, we wonder how many Americans actually know what the foundation does—or how many members of the media, for that matter.

Listening to news reports, you'd think the sole purpose of this outfit is to help the Clintons get rich and do favors for their shady friends. And while, to be sure, some of the reports about specific donors have been troubling—and suggest questionable judgment by the Clintons—what's missing is a broader, more balanced look at how the foundation mobilizes money for good causes and who, in reality, puts up most of that money. (Hint: It's not dictators looking for favors from the State Department.) While people shouldn't stop asking hard questions about the foundation, they should pay more attention to its approach and programs.

In fact, the Clinton Foundation stands as one of the more successful efforts of recent years to mobilize new resources for philanthropy. Since its founding in 2001, it has raised nearly $2 billion, according an independent review by the Washington Post. Yes, chunks of that money have come from the Clintons' network of political donors and corporate friends, which is how fundraising often works: You hit up the rich people you know for your causes. And, sure, some of them may not have the purest motives for ponying up, especially if you're someone who can return favors later, but that's the nature of the game.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Philanthropic fundraising is more like political fundraising than many may imagine. You think every hedge fund guy who gives big at the Robin Hood's annual gala is solely focused on poor kids in East New York? Or that every tech leader who recently listened to Marc Benioff's pleas and chipped in to fight poverty in the Bay Area has a heart of gold? Or that everyone sitting on MoMA's board is only there because they love art? Come on.

If you look too closely at how the sausage is made for any large fundraising operation, you probably won't like what you see. And that's all the more true if America's messiest power couple is making the sausage.

The other missing context here is this: Intermediaries like the Clinton Foundation and donor networks play a growing role in philanthropy, which is generally a good thing. In fact, some think that peer-driven and collaborative efforts to mobilize money is one of the most exciting trends in philanthropy. This approach is particularly popular among women donors, who've built some of the stronger philanthropy networks of recent years.

Meanwhile, another exciting trend in philanthropy—also embodied by the Clinton Foundation—is how funders are creating deeper partnerships with government and business in order to leverage money and have bigger impact.

But a downside of these schmooze-and-fund models, which can have many moving parts—both in terms of where money comes from and where it goes—is that there's more room for conflicts of interest, or the appearance of such, than with a traditional private foundation.

Overall, you can bash the Clintons for their well-known flaws; but you also have to give them a lot credit for harnessing one of the top power networks in U.S. society to a range of good causes and advancing the state of philanthropy. Bill Clinton may be no saint like Jimmy Carter; but it's a good thing that he didn't decide to focus on oil painting after leaving the White House.

As for what the Clinton Foundation's causes are, you'd think we would all know that by now, given the deluge of media attention around the foundation. But most of us probably know more about Sidney Blumenthal's consulting gig than, say, the foundation's work in Africa. Speaking of which, it's not just places like Africa where the foundation works, it's also in different parts of America.

The latest Clinton Global Initiatives (CGI) America conference, which was just held in Denver, offers a good snapshot of this part of the foundation's mission. It and involved a long list of sponsors including the Kresge Foundation and the Peter G. Peterson Foundation, as well as a number of corporate sponsors including Toyota Motors North America, CH2M, Cheniere Energy, the Coca-Cola Company, Freeport-McMoRan Inc., Noble Energy, APCO Worldwide, and Diageo.

The conference convened more than 1000 leaders from business, foundation, NGO, and government sectors to advance solutions that encourage economic growth, support long-term competitiveness, and increase social mobility in the United States.

As part of this conference, CGI America attendees made 79 new "Commitments to Action"—specific and measurable plans for addressing significant challenges. These 79 new actions cover a wide array of policy areas including access to education and job training, financing for small businesses, clean energy solutions, and more.

So what do some of these new commitments look like? Here's just a taste. A more extensive list of the commitments is available here.

McCain about a possible attack by Israel against Iran. [cut to interview] Would you discourage Israel if their leadership came to you as President and said we're going to strike Iran's nuclear sites?

JOHN MCCAIN: I can't get into that kind of hypothetical but the Iranians are testing these missiles not because of action on the part of the Israelis in my view. This is part of a calculated plans [sic], developing nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them. And nations led by all of our European friends as well as other countries, we have to impose meaningful, tough effective sanctions on the Iranians to modify their behavior. We cannot ever allow a second Holocaust.

COURIC: Do you get a sense, Sen. McCain, that an attack by Israel on Iran is imminent?

MCCAIN: I have no idea. I know this, that Iran continues to develop nuclear weapons in violation of various treaties and their own commitments and we need to do everything we can to modify that behavior in the form of very tough economic and other sanctions. Their economy is not strong because they have a lousy government.

COURIC: What do you think should be done right now that isn't been done in that department?

MCCAIN: Impose tough sanctions. There are European financial institutions extending unlimited lines of credit to the Iranians. Shut all that down. Make things very, very tough economically on the Iranians and trade and other ways and I think it can have a beneficial effect.

COURIC: Beyond a summer gas tax plan that nobody thinks will pass, are you offering any kind of relief to the American people who as you know are really struggling right now?

MCCAIN: Well, uh, we've got quickly, um go offshore if the states agree and explore and exploit those areas. If you lift the moratorium on offshore exploration, uh, I think that will send a signal and have an affect on gas prices immediately. The gas tax holiday was just a chance to give some people a little bit of relief [laughs] that's all it was. A lot of people say it was a gimmick and wouldn't work. A lot of people who are driving the furtherest [sic] in the oldest cars are low income Americans, really would like to have a little bit of relief.

COURIC: Your advisors say you're promising to balance the budget by the end of your first term, Sen. McCain. Are you personally making this commitment to the American people?

MCCAIN: Yes. Absolutely. And if we reduce spending, then we can do it. It all has to do with spending. It all has to do with discipline, which is out of control.

COURIC: What's your reaction to leading economists who say it's all but impossible to meet that goal? That you'd have to cut spending or raise taxes beyond what anyone could anticipate is possible. Is it really achievable?

MCCAIN: I'm saying that there is five Nobel laureates and 300 economists who think my economic plan is a good one. I say that those that disagree, I respect their opinion but growth and revenue increases is what will balance the budget.

COURIC: Some Republicans meanwhile have privately complained that your campaign organization is in disarray and if you can't effectively run a campaign, how can you effectively run the country? What's your response to that?

MCCAIN: My response is that I do town hall meetings all the time. And not a single person in the town hall meetings says, "How's your campaign organization doing?" What they say is, "How you going to get my health care affordable?" "I'm worried about my job." "I can't afford to drive my car anymore." "How am I going to, uh, er, keep my home loan, stay in my home, afford my mortgage." That's what they're talking about. That's what I'm talking about.

John McCain Invokes Specter of a Second Holocaust with Regard to Iran (ABC 07/09/08 6:44pm)
JOHN MCCAIN [on Iranian missile tests]: It's alarming. It's part of the overall effort on the part of the Iranians to acquire nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them. I strongly feel that we must enact meaningful and powerful sanctions, joined by our European allies and others who consider this threat very seriously.

CHARLES GIBSON: But, with all due respect, that's what the president has been calling for for some time in reaction to the Iranians and it hasn't gotten us anywhere

MCCAIN: Well, we haven't done it, Charlie. I hope that this may be a catalyst to actually come together and impose these sanctions on the Iranians. At the end of the day, also we cannot afford to have a second holocaust.

GIBSON: [...] Well John McCain has been hammering away at Barack Obama for his position on Iran and he's also criticizing Obama for changing position on a number of other issues [...].

GIBSON: I'm curious, there's been a lot of speculation in the press about whether your opponent may be shifting positions in some areas, moving to the center, a little more right than he was in the primaries. Do you see him shifting positions?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: It appears so, although I have not been pa ying real close attention, but I would say on the issue of Iraq, I'm glad he's going for the first time in 900 days. I'm glad he is, for the first time, asking for a sit-down briefing with General Petraeus and I would be very interested in what his position on Iraq is when he returns.

GIBSON: You're not ready yet to call him a flip-flopper?

MCCAIN: Oh, it's obvious that what I say doesn't affect American public opinion nearly as much as what he says does.

GIBSON: You think so?

MCCAIN: Well, the fact is he has changed his positions on FISA, on public financing, on his agreement that he says he'd go back any time, any place to have a town hall meeting with me. We were before the same organization yesterday. We could have just stood there together and answered their questions. I think LULAC would have gotten a lot more out of it. He said that he would do that. He said he would take public financing for the general election if I did as well and said that he agreed to it, but those things will be judged by the American people, but I won't hesitate to point 'em out.

Williams Asks McCain about His New Ad, Iran (MSNBC 07/09/08 7:20pm)
BRIAN WILLIAMS: . . . since this day, again, started with that missile launch of Iran, that topic dominated a morning round of interviews, ours included, with the presumptive nominee John McCain . . .

MCCAIN: Hopefully, at this event, it will serve as a catalyst that will gel all of the different factors that have been out there that will allow us to act with our friends and allies in the most effective fashion and modify Iranian behavior but we cannot allow a second Holocaust.

WILLIAMS: Senator, let's switch to the domestic campaign. You have a new ad out that contrasts a lot of behavior in this country in, one presumes, the sixties with your record of service. What it says is your record of patriotism, love of country. In the ad you say we live in a dangerous world and you call the US economy a shambles, which seems to be a tougher, more morose message than you've been using on the campaign trail. Do you stick by that message?

MCCAIN: I think our economy, it, it, it is certainly in dire situation. We continue to see the economy deteriorate. We continue to see the increase in a price of a gallon of gas. We continue to see jobs lost in this country and we have a great deal to do.

WILLIAMS: The ad seems to play on the word "hope" many times and in the script it appears in quotes, "don't 'hope' for a better life, vote for one," . . . the implication is rather clear, but matched against the video, say the height of the domestic uprising, 1968, your opponent was about six years old. What are you trying to imply about what he was doing during the Viet Nam years as opposed to what we know you were doing?

MCCAIN: [laughs] I-I-I'm not, I think the point is that this nation has be--, was united after the Ronald Reagan came to the presidency, we joined together in common cause we joined together to win the Cold War. Now we face new challenges, the threat of radical Islamic extremism, we're in two wars, we were just discussing the Iranian threat and we have major challenges obviously to our economy and our children's' future. I'm trying to say that I'm prepared to take on those challenges.

Lindsey Graham Invokes Hitler in Relation to Iran (FNC 06/09/08 4:05pm)
DAVID ASMAN: […] is there any room for dialogue do we have to stand tough?

LINDSEY GRAHAM: The dialogue has to be between the world community and Iran. We have to be tough. The world should unite around the idea that this missile testing along with Iran's refusal to abandon their nuclear weapons program presents a grave danger to the world. So the right solution to this problem is not to sit down unilaterally with the Iranians and give them something. It is for the world to coalesce around the idea that Iran will punished if they move forward with their efforts to get a nuclear weapon and put it on top of the missile.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ASMAN: We do not have to give our man anything if we sit down and talk to them.

GRAHAM: What are you going to talk to them about?

[long silence]

ASMAN: You cannot think of anything?

GRAHAM: No. [...] Talk does not matter to Iran. They will respond to action and I do not want a military engagement with Iran. It would be a very difficult task for us, the world at large, but talking is not going to work. What we need to do is impose sanctions that will.

They depend on gasoline. The western world, China and Russia can change Iranian behavior if we act. Talking will embolden these people. Acting will deter them.

ASMAN: We just had a release of hostages in Venezuela and we had been in this almost endless conversation. Hugo Chavez got in the middle of it. We had been told time and time we have to sit down with the rebels. The sitting down obviously did nothing but in power the rebels and Hugo Chavez at the same time. Is there a similarity here in these situations?

GRAHAM: Yeah, the Colombian president took matters into his own hand. They came up with the military strategy that was marvelous [...]. We sat down with Hitler and it never worked. Give him one more country. Appease this guy. Talking with Iran is a form of appeasement.

We need world action, not just United States action, not just Israeli action. The world needs to rally around the idea that we' re not going to let Iran get a nuclear weapon.

ASMAN: Would we support Israel if, on its own, it tried to take out those nuclear installations?

GRAHAM: In my opinion there is time to avoid that choice. Now is the time to act decisively with the world, speaking with one voice, but here is the question for the world. Are we going to sit on the sidelines and allow a nuclear weapon and missile technology to start world war three? The answer to me is not.

ASMAN: Israel will not. The question is, will we support it if they act unilaterally?

GRAHAM: It is my belief that the scenario of Israel attacking Iran is not a good scenario for the world or Israel, we need to avoid that if possible. If I'm the Israeli prime minister I am not going to sit the sidelines and listen to the rhetoric coming out of Iran, watch this weapons test and their nuclear program mature without doing something. The worst option in my opinion is to do nothing while you still can do something.

Matthews: McCain Sounds Like Cheney (MSNBC 07/09/08 5:55pm)
JOHN MCCAIN: We cannot allow a second Holocaust.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: . . . a second Holocaust. Of course John McCain there this morning referring to the test firing of the Iranians . . . Jill Zuckman, a second Holocaust, it looks to me like politics is in play here. Serious politics.

JILL ZUCKMAN: Well, Sen. McCain has taken a very hard line on Iran for a very long time and one of the things he talks about is President Ahmedinijad's own words. Calling Israel a, "stinking corpse," calling the Holocaust a "myth." He goes on and on ad on like that and Sen. McCain is very clear that he doesn't think Iran should get any benefit of the doubt from the United States . . .

MATTHEWS: . . . is this usual politics in America? . . . anything unusual about it? Over the line? Within the line? Appropriate politics, whatever?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOAN WALSH: I think a little bit over the line. I mean, "second Holocaust"? Come on. Again, this is John McCain helping Barack Obama because he sounds like a lunatic and he makes clear that he's running for Bush's third term. He sounds like a neocon in the room with Cheney planning the next strike on Iran. It's really beyond mainstream politics in my opinion.

WALSH: Absolutely.

Republicans in Senate Move Towards Obama's Position on Iran While McCain Sticks With Bush (MSNBC 07/09/08 5:07pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Here's Sen. McCain talking to Brian Williams . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: This kind of progress and this kind of testing that the Iranians are making is here and now and it cries out for collective action to cut off now the liens of credit that the Iranians are getting to cut off now the trade and diplomatic activities . . . we're in a situation where we have to act now . . . we can't just wait until next January to take meaningful action.

MATTHEWS: Andrea, I feel like one of those people with the earphones on trying to figure out the translation there. What is the difference there between what Barack said and what McCain said?

ANDREA MITCHELL: Barack Obama is saying that we should have aggressive diplomacy . . . John McCain is saying we need sanctions, economic punishment, diplomatic pressure on Iran, not diplomatic engagement. Interestingly Dick Luger, the Republican vice chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations committee during a hearing on Iran this afternoon agreed with Barack Obama . . . Luger and other Republicans are beginning to move to the side of those Democrats . . . calling for some kind of diplomatic involvement with Iran without preconditions. The McCain position is identical to the Bush position but it is not universally accepted within the Republican Party.

MATTHEWS: Let's talk about the politics on the home front. Everybody in America, practically, roots for Israel in a general sense, obviously people that are Jewish have a deeper commitment than most people. But there's also a huge Christian conservative element in this country that's deeply pro-Israeli. When John McCain made a statement, here, let's talk a look at what he said . . .

MCCAIN: If Iran attacked Israel, I'd have no doubt that the entire nation would erupt in conflict. The Irani—the Iraqis would have to respond, as any nation does that's attacked and the entire region and the United States would probably be drawn into the conflict . . .

MATTHEWS: Sen. McCain also talked this morning about the possibility of a second Holocaust, that's certainly incendiary language politically.

ROGER SIMON: . . .Sen. McCain has used that as his argument for staying in Iraq . . . we have to have a peacekeeping presence in the region otherwise we face open warfare. The problem is, the other bite you showed, Sen. McCain calls for isolating Iran. The trouble with isolation is, once you isolate them, then what'd you have left?

On Iran 'Joke,' Borger Says: That's Just McCain Being McCain (CNN 07/09/08 6:41pm)
WOLF BLITZER: What do you make of Senator McCain joking—and it was clearly, he was trying to be funny—when he said, you know the US is exporting a lot of cigarettes to Iran and he said maybe that's good 'cause they'll all die from the cigarettes then he quickly said, 'You know, I'm just joking.'

DAVID BRODY: I mean, obviously McCain's critics will say he's got an itchy trigger finger so clearly, a comment like that isn't gonna play well initially, but let's take a step back here for a moment and go to pre-implosion McCain. Remember that where he was the front-runner and a lot of people said that he was too guarded, that he was too close to the vest and he didn't really open up too much and he needed to get back to that straight talk express.

Well, you know, some of those moments are really gonna have to work for him to be successful. In other words, he may have a bomb like the one we're talking about today and the 'Bomb […] Iran' one as well. That may backfire, but, if he gets nine out of ten right, it actually could actually [sic] help him a little bit.

BLITZER: When you're running for president, you've gotta have a filter.

JACK CAFFERTY: Well, you know, the cigarettes are slower than 'bomb […] Iran' as was just suggested. The essence of the story is that our sales of exports from this country to Iran are up more than ten-fold during the seven and a half years of the Bush administration. They've gone from $8 million a year to $150 million a year while President Bush stomps around, talking tough about sanctions.

'We gotta crack the whip. We gotta isolate Iran.' We're selling 'em cigarettes and braziers and a whole bunch of other things to the tune of about $150 billion a year. It's a hypocrisy with a capitol HIP.

GLORIA BORGER: I say let McCain be McCain. This is who John McCain is and you knew it was real because his wife started jabbing him in the back, telling him to be quiet and this is John McCain. The public ought to get to know who he is.

Tom Delay Expresses Classic Liberal Views on Deficit, Declares Willingness to Bomb Iran (MSNBC 07/09/08 5:07pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Let me ask you about your Republican party which you have fought so hard and some people would say over the top in winning for . . . Tom Davis . . . he said if the Republican Party were a dog food, it would be taken off the shelves right now, is it that bad?

TOM DELAY: It's pretty bad and I'm done pointing fingers . . .

MATTHEWS: A lot of people would say the biggest thing that went wrong with the Republican party wasn't the personality of this president or ther war in Iraq but the fact that Republicans weren't Republicans, they ran up big spending in the last seven years . . .

DELAY: We did balance the budget, back in the 90s—

MATTHEWS: I'm talking about the last eight years. Did you know the national debt has gone from 6,000,000,000,000 to 10,000,000,000,000?

DELAY: And we fought a war.

MATTHEWS: I know. 4 trillion. That didn't all go to the war.

DELAY: Almost 1 trillion of it is the war.

MATTHEWS: 4. Trillion.

DELAY: Yup.

MATTHEWS: The world economy's 50 trillion. We owe 10 trillion.

DELAY: I understand but as a percentage of GDP it has grown a little but—

MATTHEWS: What are you, John Kenneth Galbraith?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DELAY: No.

MATTHEWS: Those are the old liberal arguments, it's a percentage of GDP. You don't think overspending has been a problem for the Republicans?

DELAY: The perception of overspending has been a problem for Republicans. And it's a bad problem for the Republicans . . . it's not spending, it's redefining government, we need to go back to constitutional principles that go back to our base . . . they want to see leadership, and they're starting to do that. Whether our members can do that by '08, I don't know . . .

MATTHEWS: Do you think we're going to go to war before the election?

DELAY: I think it's possible.

MATTHEWS: . . . Olmert's got a weak government in Israel. He might . . . feel in a position to show his strength? . . . we may decide, Dick Cheney may say, influence the president, say, if Israel has to attack, it'll take them two thousand sorties to do the job, we can do it in a day, why don't we do it clean and get it over with because we'll get blamed anyway?

DELAY: And particularly if Obama is the next president.

MATTHEWS: Tell me what you think as a conservative hawk, do you think we should move over there--

DELAY: Absolutely.

MATTHEWS: --between now and the election?

DELAY: We should've moved a lot earlier.

MATTHEWS: What should we do?

DELAY: First and foremost we should blockade Iran, quit dallying around in all this diplomatic and sanctions . . .

[. . .]

DELAY: We should never take a military strike off the table.

MATTHEWS: What if Olmert calls up you and says, "should I go?"

DELAY: I'd say go. But maybe we want to go too. . .

MATTHEWS: Is that where you are on that right now?

DELAY: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Go.

DELAY: No. Not right now. But if things deteriorate over the next two to three months . . .

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Do you think that's a common thought around the White House crowd? The Dick Cheney crowd? Are they thinking about acting now, while they still have a chance to end that nuclear threat from Iran?

DELAY: I can't answer that . . .

Dear Mr. Podesta:

I presume that there are very few observations of mine, which could be of use to Mrs. Clinton, but I do believe that she should do something about the repetitious content of Sanders attacks. There are too many functional illiterates now in the world and more than half of the population of the United States are a part of the irrational masses that the illiteracy produces. One cannot reason without an acceptable assimilation of language. I remember that Heidegger said that “man speaks first and then thinks”, and he also wrote that “we were given the PROMISE of language”. Germany after World War I was also in that situation and Goebels taught us that if a people is told the same lie a thousand times, the people is drawn to believe it. It is Trump’s main asset but Sanders is also using it.
There are a few things that may be of use.

He definitely opened himself to a definitely destructive attack when he referred to the achievements of the Cuban revolution. The health service of Cuba is as good or better than the French, but to establish that in the United States his revolution has to be an armed revolution. A culture of helping each other to the extent the Cuban people have achieved has to be made up with an absolute control of the media and the education. Sanders understood that very well but he does not mention anything beyond saying that “the people have to stand up”, “the people must rise”. Lenin and Mao also used to say that, because it was understood that it meant “to rise in arms”. The use of the language faculty is so irrepleaceable that Cuban have placed great importance to it in their education system. Even Stalin recommended workers organizations to learn Russian well with no swearing words and no foreign words. Sanders does not explain how he is going to manage to fulfill most of his promises. He says that the people must stand up. If the speaker is not clear, the listener does not reason what he hears.

Whenever Sanders cannot give a proper answer or a proper explanation, he repeats the words of the question and goes on to repeat what he always says in connection with the subject.

3. The American people will not want a revolution as the one Sanders is preaching. They may be willing to live an “evolution”. Sanders would not be able to fulfill his promises even if he changes to Constitution to be President for three terms. The change has to be gradual: strengthening and improving what has already been achieved.

4. Stress that repeating the same thing always is a fascist technique. That it is what Trump is doing by not allowing the people to reason, by not explaining anything, by saying the opposite of what he has already said if there is a strong reaction against. Trump last week asked the people in a meeting to raise their hands and swear. I suppose it was to swear their support although I did not hear that part.

5. Finally, I feel rather sure that Turner does not know what Chalia and Burnett and others in CNN are doing constantly working for Trump. Somebody should tell him that he is being used as Nazi media were used.

Karzai's request was not for a "pledge" of non-interference in the election but actual non-interference -- and that was one reason he gave for waiting till after the election, to see whether the United States actually interfered or not. So I would go back to the original: "non-interference in the April presidential election that will determine Karzai's successor."
> 3. As to Obama's statement giving Karzai "a face-saving way out," I think the reader will not understand what we are saying if we don't follow with the original phrase "if he really wishes to sign the BSA."
> 4. On the paragraph on which Obama fixes the troop numbers, the introductory word should not be "Alternatively" but "Secondly." This is all one statement, given at one time. This is the second point Obama must make in the speech. For we won't know for some time after the speech is given whether Obama's statements in the prior paragraph are enough to move Karzai to sign the BSA. And even if he signs it, Obama will still need to announce the troop number in this statement since the number is NOT in the BSA. So "Secondly" was right.

> 5. The results of the poll on public support for the U.S. operations in Afghanistan and for leaving a residual force was published in your paper. I am forwarding the site (which Aysha found) to you separately.
> 6. In the second to last paragraph, it's not just that the zero option would "threaten the safety of the presidential election" but would "threaten the outcome" (as I original wrote) in many ways: as you suggest, threaten the safety, but if the zero option did collapse the Afghan security forces, the election might not even be held -- or the turn out (especially in Sunni areas) would be so low that the outcome would have no legitimacy. This is why "threaten the outcome" seemed the right term.

NOTABLES

--JOE BIDEN 'NOT SAYING NO': Vice President Joe Biden 's political operation has entered a more active phase in recent days, with several moves being contemplated to clear the way for him to run for president should he choose to do so, two longtime Biden advisers tell ABC's RICK KLEIN . The vice president himself has not authorized any specific moves, but nor has he objected, a signal Biden confidantes take as suggesting he's serious about potentially challenging Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination. "He's not saying no," one adviser said. "This is his time to figure it out." Among the potential moves are efforts to restart a moribund fundraising operation, launch a new political action committee, and find a way to channel the energies of a "Draft Biden" movement that's now not being led by Biden insiders. One adviser said the new actions would roll out over the next 30 to 45 days. http://abcn.ws/1eL6aPv

--FLASHBACK: When ABC's GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS interviewed Biden on "Good Morning America" in January, he said "there's a chance" that he would challenge Clinton, but added, "I don't think I have to make up my mind until the summer." In the interview he said he considered the presidential contest "wide open on both sides."

--ANALYSIS -- ABC's RICK KLEIN: The confluence of forces and events that have led Joe Biden to this point are deep and vast, from Democratic unease with Hillary Clinton's campaign performance to the shattering turmoil in the vice president's personal life, all at this particular stage of his career. Now, with his political machine whirring into service, the calculus becomes pretty simple: what does Biden himself want? The buzz and now the maneuverings are happening without the vice president's authorization, but with at least his acquiescence. Aides and advisers say no decision is imminent. The goal now for those who support him is to make sure he would have what he needs in place - not what Hillary Clinton has, of course, but enough to make a third presidential run realistic for Biden.

--WHAT TEAM BIDEN IS SAYING: Over the weekend, New York Times opinion columnist Maureen Dowd reported that before he died of brain cancer in May, Beau Biden "tried to make his father promise to run, arguing that the White House should not revert to the Clintons and that the country would be better off with Biden values" and that the vice president has been "talking to friends, family and donors about jumping in." Kendra Barkoff, a spokeswoman for Biden, issued the following statement on Saturday: "As the Biden family continues to go through this difficult time, the Vice President is focused on his family and immersed in his work. In recent weeks, the Vice President has worked on the nuclear deal with Iran, traveled across the country to highlight the Administration's economic priorities, and more." http://abcn.ws/1eL6aPv

--BY THE NUMBERS: In the most recent ABC News-Washington Post poll released July 20, Clinton stood at the head of the Democratic pack with the backing of 63 percent of registered Democrats compared to 14 percent for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and 12 percent for Biden. However, the poll also found that less than half -- 42 percent -- of Clinton's supporters described themselves as "very enthusiastic" about her candidacy. Seventy-two percent of Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents said they are satisfied with their choice of candidates, potentially leaving some wiggle room for Biden.

HILLARY ON THE AIR

HILLARY CLINTON'S $2 MILLION TELEVISION ADS: ALL ABOUT HER MOM. There's one person Hillary Clinton really wants the voters of America to get to know more than anybody else. And her name is Dorothy Rodham, ABC's LIZ KREUTZ notes. Dorothy is Clinton's late mother. She died in 2011. But she's playing a starring role in her daughter's presidential campaign, and is the focus of Clinton's first television ads. On Tuesday, Clinton's campaign will begin broadcasting two TV ads in Iowa and New Hampshire. The one-minute spots, which will air over the course of five weeks, emphasize Clinton's mother's story over her own. The first ad, titled "Dorothy," is almost completely devoid of any discussion of Clinton's credentials. Instead, it's focused on recounting her mother's trauma-filled childhood. "I think about all the Dorothy's all over America who fight for their families, who never give up," Clinton says while video of a mother tucking her daughter in to bed plays. "That's why I'm doing this. That's why I've always done this. For all the Dorothy's." http://abcn.ws/1Ijoncz

FIVETHIRTYEIGHT IN THE NOTE

THERE'S NO PERFECT WAY TO SORT THE CANDIDATES FOR A PRIMARY DEBATE. From FiveThirtyEight's HARRY ENTEN: "Does Fox News' use of national polls to sift a top 10 from the 17-strong GOP field make sense? That's just one of several big questions about understanding each candidate's actual chance of winning the nomination. Gov. Scott Walker, for example, currently leads Iowa surveys -- how much does that matter? Does Walker's lead in Iowa mean more than Donald Trump's short tenure atop national and New Hampshire polls? How about former Gov. Jeb Bush's barrels of money and Gov. Chris Christie's early endorsements? None of these measurements is a perfect predictor, and we don't have a very large sample size when it comes to open primary elections in the modern era. But that doesn't mean there's no signal in these early metrics, and some have been more predictive than others." http://53eig.ht/1KoVPrz HAPPENING TODAY: Today, the Granite State is in the spotlight. The New Hampshire Union Leader's Voters First Presidential Forum is this evening and almost all of the GOP candidates will be there, ABC's SHUSHANNAH WALSHE notes. Donald Trump, Mike Huckabee, and Jim Gilmore are out, but everyone else will be there. Ted Cruz, Scott Walker, Jeb Bush, Chris Christie, Ben Carson, John Kasich, Carly Fiorina, Bobby Jindal, Lindsey Graham, George Pataki, Rick Perry, Rick Santorum, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio are all expected to attend. It's at 6:45 PM Eastern tonight at St. Anselm College in Manchester. The event is a response to the debates and the ten candidate limit, but don't call it a debate, instead candidates will be questioned individually by a moderator.

BERNIE SANDERS LANDS A SWEET ENDORSEMENT FROM BEN & JERRY'S CO-FOUNDER. Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders has landed the sweetest food endorsement so far of the 2016 election cycle: Ben Cohen, the co-founder of Ben & Jerry's. The ice cream magnate spoke Sunday to a gymnasium of supporters in Franklin, New Hampshire, telling them "as a person who has been his constituent for the last 30 years, I can tell you: this guy is the real thing." In an interview with ABC's BRAD MIELKE, Cohen explained his involvement. "Finally, there's a politician worth working for," he said with a grin. "So I'm working for him." Along with an endorsement and some prepared remarks, the former CEO, 64, brought along ice cream. A line formed around the front door as he personally handed out favorites, including Chocolate Fudge Brownie and Chocolate Chip Cookie Dough, to anyone who wanted a scoop. Nearly all of the hundreds of attendees stayed. It was ice cream weather, too. A day after sweating through his shirt at a town hall without air conditioning, Sanders spoke for almost 90 minutes, over the whir of several fans. http://abcn.ws/1DkbB48

DONALD TRUMP PLAYS DOWN DEBATE EXPECTATIONS. Republican presidential contender Donald Trump played down expectations for the first GOP debate slated for Thursday, saying "I'm not a debater" and he would not be "throwing punches" against his opponents on the stage. "These politicians, I always say, are all talk no action. They debate all the time," Trump told ABC's JONATHAN KARL on "This Week" Sunday. "I don't debate, I build. I've created tremendous jobs, I've created a great company." "Maybe my whole life is a debate in a way, but the fact is I'm not a debater, and they are," Trump added. "With that being said, I look forward to it, we'll see what happens." The current 2016 GOP frontrunner went on to say that he doesn't anticipate attacking his opponents on the stage, saying that every attack he's made on the campaign trail has been a counterattack, according to ABC's RYAN STRUYK. "I don't think I'm going to be throwing punches," he said. "I'm not looking to attack." http://abcn.ws/1IDVz56

BERNIE SANDERS RESPONDS TO POSSIBLE JOE BIDEN RUN. Presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders said he's "very fond" of Vice President Joe Biden, but that "the American people... want to go beyond conventional establishment politics," ABC's MARYALICE PARKS report. Sanders made the statements in response to a question from ABC's JONATHAN KARL about Biden considering another run for president. Sanders suggested that voters are looking for a change in 2016 . "The government has to respond to the needs of the middle class, not the billionaires," he said, "I think that's what going on in this country, and I am not sure conventional politics will do it anymore." As for his primary challenger Hillary Clinton, Sanders refused to answer "yes or no" as to whether he thinks the former secretary of state and Democratic frontrunner is honest and trustworthy. According to a Quinnipiac poll released last week, 57 percent of registered voters do not think she is trustworthy. "I have a lot of respect for Hillary Clinton," Sanders said. "I am not going to be engaging in personal attacks against her." http://abcn.ws/1hdtDec

RICK SANTORUM CALLS GOP DEBATE RULES 'ARBITRARY'. Republican presidential candidate Rick Santorum said Sunday that the criteria for the first Republican debate this week, which will limit participation to the Top 10 GOP candidates according to recent national polls, are "arbitrary," ABC's BEN GITTLESON notes. "These national polls are irrelevant," Santorum, a former U.S. senator from Pennsylvania who ran for president in 2012, said on ABC's "This Week." "I was at 1 percent in the national polls four years ago and ended up winning 11 states, four million votes, won the Iowa caucus." Santorum is polling low nationally and is not expected to gain entry to the first Republican debate on Thursday, according to an ABC News analysis. http://abcn.ws/1MDZCQD

--REINCE RESPONDS: Republican National Committee Chair Reince Priebus responded to criticism from Santorum and others by saying he was grateful that the first two debates would include all the candidates, even if the ones polling lower would be featured in a lower-profile forum earlier in the evening. "We're proud of the fact that everyone running is going to have an opportunity," Priebus said on "This Week" Sunday. "And the reality is, and it might be a little harsh, but you can't necessarily treat someone that's polling at 18 or 20 percent the same as someone that's polling at a half a percent or 1 percent." WATCH: http://abcn.ws/1LYLb9h

LINDSEY GRAHAM AND JOHN MCCAIN'S EXCELLENT ADVENTURE. Lindsey Graham took his secret weapon to New Hampshire this weekend: John McCain. The two attended several functions, including a barbecue for veterans, a house party, an outdoor concert and a town hall meeting in New Hampshire, ABC's BRAD MIELKE reports from the Granite State. McCain is still revered by many New Hampshire Republicans, and Graham tried to tap into that enthusiasm as they took questions together. Graham stumped for McCain in 2008, along with Joe Lieberman. Together, they were known as the "three amigos." Over the weekend, McCain returned the favor. "Great experiences in my life have been in New Hampshire," said McCain, who surprised many by winning the 2000 and 2008 primaries. "If you've been impressed today, as I hope you have been, by this candidate, then I want you to do me one favor. Tell your friends, "go see Lindsey Graham." http://abcn.ws/1M4YI0D

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Dear John,

Happy Halloween!

With only 6 days to go before the election, the race to the White House continues to tighten. Whether or not November 6th is a trick or a treat depends on just a few key states and races across the country.

We simply have to stop Mitt Romney and his Dirty Energy allies from gaining control. I don't think I have to tell you how devastating a President Romney would be for the environmental movement. Thanks to your steadfast support of LCV and LCV Victory Fund, we have continued to run a highly effective and targeted campaign in some of the tightest races in the country.

As you will see below, we recently and significantly have expanded our efforts. We are still trying to raise a final $250,000 for LCV Victory Fund in these closing days.

With deep appreciation,

Gene

Presidential and Senate Races Remain Close

LCV has been able to go back into important key states to make one final push for President Obama and some of our environmental champions in the Senate.

– In Colorado, LCV announced a new $850,000 television ad campaign re-launching an ad featuring a former employee of a local wind turbine manufacturing plant who says he "got laid off because Mitt Romney and his friends in Congress want to eliminate tax credits for wind energy." The ad features Chris Maese of Pueblo, Colo., who built wind turbines at Vestas' Pueblo facility. Vestas is the world's largest wind turbine manufacturer. In the ad, Maese talks about how Romney's opposition to extending the Production Tax Credit (PTC) for wind energy helped cause his layoff in August. The ad is airing in the Denver media market through Election Day.

– In Arizona, LCV Victory Fund and Majority PAC launched a new $1.2 million television ad campaign outlining the risks of sending former uranium mining lobbyist Jeff Flake to the Senate. Flake has worked in Congress to allow mining for radioactive uranium near the Grand Canyon and Colorado River, which would endanger the drinking water of 25 million Americans, while taking campaign cash from his mining industry allies. The ad, "Two Jobs," is airing through Election Day.

– In Virginia, earlier this week, LCV and Majority PAC launched an $800,000 ad buy in Virginia against George Allen. The ad targets George Allen's cozy relationship with special interests like the oil and gas industry. The ad will run through Election Day in key markets in Virginia. You can view the ad, "Worked for Them," by clicking here .

– In Wisconsin, LCV has announced its involvement in the Wisconsin Senate race with a $1 million dollar ad buy designed to help make Tammy Baldwin the next United States Senator. LCV is launching two ads that will air through Election Day. "Cash ," running in the Milwaukee media market, highlights how Tommy Thompson cashed in when he joined a lobbying firm in Washington. "Allies ," running in the Madison media market, outlines how Baldwin has worked with President Obama to create clean energy jobs and would build on those efforts in the United States Senate.

Update on Massachusetts Senate Race

I'm sure you are following the Massachusetts Senate race as closely as I am at this point. Most of the recent polls seem to be pointing in a good direction. LCV made the decision to spend over $1 million dollars to help send Elizabeth Warren to the US Senate. Here are a couple highlights of what we are doing:

- LCV kicked off our campaign late this summer with an unprecedented field effort to reach swing voters in the Boston suburbs. We've already knocked on nearly 200,000 doors and we're continuing to expand our campaign.

- We also launched a four-part mail program to expose Brown's ties to Big Oil and his 278 votes against President Obama's agenda. This targeted program will reach 150,000 persuadable households across the state.

Update on the Michigan Clean Energy Ballot Measure

The only place in which clean energy will be explicitly on the ballot in November is in Michigan, where the voters will decide on Proposition 3, which would increase the state's production of clean renewable energy to 25 percent by 2025.

Both major utilities in Michigan are fiercely opposing the initiative, which is supported by labor unions, nurses, environmental groups and a broad array of organizations. In a year where oil and coal companies have spent millions of dollars attacking clean energy, passing Proposition 3 in a Midwestern industrial state like Michigan would send a clear message that clean energy is central to rebuilding the economy and creating millions of good-paying jobs. LCV is working closely with Michigan LCV in this critical campaign, which has recently received the endorsement from former President Bill Clinton.

Please check out my op-ed earlier this month on this important issue by clicking here .

LCV Action Fund Surpasses $2.1 million raised with GiveGreen

LCV Action Fund has now raised and contributed over $2.1 million in support of environmental candidates this cycle, thanks to many of you, and it continues to increase. If you haven't yet done so, now is the time to donate as generously as you can to pro-environment political candidates. For environmental voters like you, the best giving strategy is to "bundle" your contributions with contributions from others who share your environmental values. Bundling through LCV Action Fund's GiveGreen magnifies the power of your contribution by calling attention to the environmental values that drive you to support the candidate in the first place. Visit www.givegreen.com today to support LCV Action Fund's featured environmental champions.

Join Us for LCV's Post-Election Report, Analysis, and Discussion

What impact did you and LCV have on the outcome of the 2012 elections? What does the new political landscape mean for the environment? Please join LCV senior political strategists for an in-depth analysis of the election results and for a preview of what we can expect in the months ahead. The call will be held on Thursday, November 8th at 2 p.m. EST. To receive the call-in number, please contact Josh Hicks at (202) 454-4565 or Josh_Hicks@lcv.org.

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test;

donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. "She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel," recalled Jacobs. "And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer."

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. "She said 'I'm going to do what's in the best interest of the U.S.,' and that was the end of it," Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, "although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it's got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people." He urged Jewish donors "to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits," adding: "I'd hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support."

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton's senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

"It's a tricky issue for her," said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran "are going to put her in a box."

Clinton's allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. "I know where she stands, but I can't talk about it," Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, "She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He soon backtracked, saying "I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal."

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

"Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don't think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is," said the donor.

Saban's representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban's financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy,” said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street’s PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

“She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community.”

McCain adviser's work as lobbyist comes to light (USA TODAY 5/21/08)
By Matt Kelley
John McCain's top foreign policy adviser lobbied the Arizona senator's staff on behalf of the republic of Georgia while he was working for the campaign, public records show. Randy Scheunemann, founder of Orion Strategies, represented the governments of Macedonia, Georgia and Taiwan between 2003 and March 1, according to the firm's filings with the Justice Department. In its latest semiannual report, the firm disclosed that Scheunemann had a phone conversation in November about Georgia with Richard Fontaine, an aide in McCain's Senate office.

McCain Assails Obama Over Readiness To Talk With Hostile Foreign Leaders (Washington Post 5/21/08)
By Glenn Kessler and Juliet Eilperin; A07
Sen. John McCain stepped up his assault on Sen. Barack Obama's foreign policy credentials at a rally in Miami yesterday, criticizing Obama's willingness to talk to Cuban President Raul Castro and other hostile foreign leaders without preconditions. But McCain's argument was undercut when a 2006 video emerged of former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a prominent McCain supporter, saying that "talking to an enemy is not in my view appeasement."

Baker Says Talking with Enemies is Not Appeasement (Washington Post blog 5/20/08)
By Glenn Kessler
A video clip of former secretary of state James A. Baker is making the rounds of the Internet, providing an interesting counterpoint to the furious argument between Sen. Barack Obama and the Republicans over whether it is proper to talk to enemies. President Bush started a furor when, during a speech to the Israeli parliament last week, he said that negotiating with "terrorists and radicals" such as Iran was "the false comfort of appeasement, which has been repeatedly discredited by history."

McCain's Savannah Press Conference (TIME blog 5/20/08)
Posted by Joe Klein
At a press conference here, I just asked John McCain about why he keeps talking about Obama's alleged willingness to talk to Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has no power over Iranian foreign policy, rather than Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei, who does. He said that Ahmadinejad is the guy who represents Iran in international forums like the United Nations, which is a fair point. When I followed with the observation that the Supreme Leader is, uh, the Supreme Leader, McCain responded that the "average American" thinks Ahmadinejad is the boss. Didn't get a chance to follow up to that, but I would have asked, "But isn't it your job to correct those sorts of mistaken impressions on the part of the American public?" Oh well.

Subject:	Iran Nuclear Deal

Dear Jake,

I have sent several detailed notes on the Iran nuclear deal, and will avoid repetition. But with the June 30 deadline fast approaching (although it may be extended), and with Hillary certain to be pressed on whether she supports the deal and will urge Congress not to disapprove it, I wanted to share a few thoughts.

1. This could well be a voting issue for many moderates in the Jewish community. The mainstream organized leadership will almost certainly oppose the deal, along with Israel and all the Republican candidates, Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, and perhaps Egypt.

2. While we cannot be sure until there is a final agreement, it appears that many of the open issues since the preliminary accord, may be resolved in Iran's favor:

(1) Enriched uranium will stay in Iran for dilution, rather than be sent to Russia or France for reprocessing.

(2) Sanctions will not be phased-out commensurate with compliance, as the US Fact Sheet indicated after the last "agreement", but may come off more quickly. This will transfer billions to Iran and enhance its funding for terrorism and its efforts to gain hegemony in the region.

(3) It is not clear what Iran will be required to do on PMD, if anything. This was required of Iraq by the UNSC in September 2002. Iran should be held to the same standard. They have yet to answer 11 of the 12 IAEA questions, yet UN sanctions will be lifted.

(4) Russia, China and Iran itself may be able to block "snapback" sanctions if there is a violation of the agreement. US companies will be disadvantaged compared to European companies, since many US non-nuclear sanctions will remain, while all EU sanctions are nuclear-related.

(5) Military sites (Parchin) are likely to be off the table for inspections.

(6) Iran will likely be able to do research on advanced centrifuges, which enrich more uranium more rapidly than the current generation. This would markedly reduce the breakout time in the last years of the accord. Presidenr Obama has conceded this point (e.g. David Sanger article in NYT, April 8, 2015)

(7) Iran will have an industrial size nuclear program, and will be left as a "nuclear capable state".

(8) Iran will be able to keep 1000 centrifuges at Fordo.

(9) Nothing in the agreement will limit its support for terrorism.

3. That said, there are likely to be positive aspects to the agreement.

(1) The Arak plutonium plant will be effectively dismantled.

(2) There will be more intrusive IAEA inspections, since Iran will sign the Additional Protocol of thr NPT.

(3) The number of centrifuges will be cut by 2/3.

(4) Iran will be a year away from breakout. It would still need to develop a nuclear weapon that can fit on a missile.

(5) Iran's stockpile of enriched uranium from 10 tons to 700 pounds.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(6) Ten years is a long time and Iran's conduct may moderate.

4, Hillary cannot oppose the agreement given her position as the President's Secretary of State and should urge its approval by Congress under Corker-Cardin. But she can and should point out concerns with it (as she did, unfortunately from my perspective, on TPP/TPA). More broadly, she should appear more muscular I her approach than the President's. The statement I suggested a few months ago still would be appropriate. But she should also say the following:

(1) As President, she would never consider Iran a strategic partner in the region. Quite the contrary, she would do all she can to oppose Iranian misconduct.

(2) Our allies in the region must know that we will stand behind them and supply them with the means to defend themselves and avoid the region tilting to Iran, including bunker-busting bombs Bush and Obama refused to provide to Israel.. Defense treaties should be considered so any attack by Iran would be considered an attack against the US.

(3) Bibi should be invited for early talks on how the partnership with Israel can be strengthened to combat Iran and Israel's other avowed enemies.

(4) A common agenda should be forged with Israel and our Arab allies.

(5) If the US itself believes Iran has cheated, as President, she would reimpose US sanctions, even if Russia-China-Iran say there was no violation. She would work to get the EU to also reimpose their sanctions.

(6) It is just as unacceptable for Iran to develop a nuclear weapon after the expiration of the agreement, as it is during the agreement, given the nature of the regime. Therefore, while she would not be president, all means should be used to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

Best wishes,

not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

My Plea to the People of Israel: Liberate Yourselves by Liberating Palestine

By Desmond Tutu | Aug. 14, 2014 | reprinted from Ha'aretz

Archbishop Emeritus Desmond Tutu, in an exclusive article for Haaretz, calls for a global boycott of Israel and urges Israelis and Palestinians to look beyond their leaders for a sustainable solution to the crisis in the Holy Land.

The past weeks have witnessed unprecedented action by members of civil society across the world against the injustice of Israel's disproportionately brutal response to the firing of missiles from Palestine. If you add together all the people who gathered over the past weekend to demand justice in Israel and Palestine – in Cape Town, Washington, D.C., New York, New Delhi, London, Dublin and Sydney, and all the other cities – this was arguably the largest active outcry by citizens around a single cause ever in the history of the world.

A quarter of a century ago, I participated in some well-attended demonstrations against apartheid. I never imagined we'd see demonstrations of that size again, but last Saturday's turnout in Cape Town was as big if not bigger. Participants included young and old, Muslims, Christians, Jews, Hindus, Buddhists, agnostics, atheists, blacks, whites, reds and greens ... as one would expect from a vibrant, tolerant, multicultural nation. I asked the crowd to chant with me: “We are opposed to the injustice of the illegal occupation of Palestine. We are opposed to the indiscriminate killing in Gaza. We are opposed to the indignity meted out to Palestinians at checkpoints and roadblocks. We are opposed to violence perpetrated by all parties. But we are not opposed to Jews.”

Earlier in the week, I called for the suspension of Israel from the International Union of Architects, which was meeting in South Africa. I appealed to Israeli sisters and brothers present at the conference to actively disassociate themselves and their profession from the design and construction of infrastructure related to perpetuating injustice, including the separation barrier, the security terminals and checkpoints, and the settlements built on occupied Palestinian land. “I implore you to take this message home: Please turn the tide against violence and hatred by joining the nonviolent movement for justice for all people of the region,” I said.

Over the past few weeks, more than 1.6 million people across the world have signed onto this movement by joining an Avaaz campaign calling on corporations profiting from the Israeli occupation and/or implicated in the abuse and repression of Palestinians to pull out. The campaign specifically targets Dutch pension fund ABP; Barclays Bank; security systems supplier G4S; French transport company Veolia; computer company Hewlett-Packard; and bulldozer supplier Caterpillar. Last month, 17 EU governments urged their citizens to avoid doing business in or investing in illegal Israeli settlements. We have also recently witnessed the withdrawal by Dutch pension fund PGGM of tens of millions of euros from Israeli banks; the divestment from G4S by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation; and the U.S. Presbyterian Church divested an estimated $21 million from HP, Motorola Solutions and Caterpillar.

It is a movement that is gathering pace. Violence begets violence and hatred, that only begets more violence and hatred. We South Africans know about violence and hatred. We understand the pain of being the polecat of the world; when it seems nobody understands or is even willing to listen to our perspective. It is where we come from. We also know the benefits that dialogue between our leaders eventually brought us; when organizations labeled “terrorist” were unbanned and their leaders, including Nelson Mandela, were released from imprisonment, banishment and exile. We know that when our leaders began to speak to each other, the rationale for the violence that had wracked our society dissipated and disappeared. Acts of terrorism perpetrated after the talks began – such as attacks on a church and a pub – were almost universally condemned, and the party held responsible snubbed at the ballot box.

The exhilaration that followed our voting together for the first time was not the preserve of black South Africans alone. The real triumph of our peaceful settlement was that all felt included. And later, when we unveiled a constitution so tolerant, compassionate and inclusive that it would make God proud, we all felt liberated. Of course, it helped that we had a cadre of extraordinary leaders. But what ultimately forced these leaders together around the negotiating table was the cocktail of persuasive, nonviolent tools that had been developed to isolate South Africa, economically, academically, culturally and psychologically. At a certain point – the tipping point – the then-government realized that the cost of attempting to preserve apartheid outweighed the benefits. The withdrawal of trade with South Africa by multinational corporations with a conscience in the 1980s was ultimately one of the key levers that brought the apartheid state – bloodlessly – to its knees. Those corporations understood that by contributing to South Africa’s economy, they were contributing to the retention of an unjust status quo. Those who continue to do business with Israel, who contribute to a sense of “normalcy” in Israeli society, are doing the people of Israel and Palestine a disservice. They are contributing to the perpetuation of a profoundly unjust status quo. Those who contribute to Israel’s temporary isolation are saying that Israelis and Palestinians are equally entitled to dignity and peace.

Ultimately, events in Gaza over the past month or so are going to test who believes in the worth of human beings. It is becoming more and more clear that politicians and diplomats are failing to come up with answers, and that responsibility for brokering a sustainable solution to the crisis in the Holy Land rests with civil society and the people of Israel and Palestine themselves. Besides the recent devastation of Gaza, decent human beings everywhere – including many in Israel – are profoundly disturbed by the daily violations of human dignity and freedom of movement Palestinians are subjected to at checkpoints and roadblocks. And Israel’s policies of illegal occupation and the construction of buffer-zone settlements on occupied land compound the difficulty of achieving an agreement settlement in the future that is acceptable for all.

The State of Israel is behaving as if there is no tomorrow. Its people will not live the peaceful and secure lives they crave – and are entitled to – as long as their leaders perpetuate conditions that sustain the conflict. I have condemned those in Palestine responsible for firing missiles and rockets at Israel. They are fanning the flames of hatred. I am opposed to all manifestations of violence. But we must be very clear that the people of Palestine have every right to struggle for their dignity and freedom. It is a struggle that has the support of many around the world. No human-made problems are intractable when humans put their heads together with the earnest desire to overcome them. No peace is impossible when people are determined to achieve it. Peace requires the people of Israel and Palestine to recognize the human being in themselves and each other; to understand their interdependence.

Missiles, bombs and crude invective are not part of the solution. There is no military solution. The solution is more likely to come from that nonviolent toolbox we developed in South Africa in the 1980s, to persuade the government of the necessity of altering its policies. The reason these tools – boycott, sanctions and divestment – ultimately proved effective was because they had a critical mass of support, both inside and outside the country. The kind of support we have witnessed across the world in recent weeks, in respect of Palestine.

My plea to the people of Israel is to see beyond the moment, to see beyond the anger at feeling perpetually under siege, to see a world in which Israel and Palestine can coexist – a world in which mutual dignity and respect reign. It requires a mind-set shift. A mind-set shift that recognizes that attempting to perpetuate the current status quo is to damn future generations to violence and insecurity. A mind-set shift that stops regarding legitimate criticism of a state's policies as an attack on Judaism. A mind-set shift that begins at home and ripples out across communities and nations and regions – to the Diaspora scattered across the world we share. The only world we share.

People united in pursuit of a righteous cause are unstoppable. God does not interfere in the affairs of people, hoping we will grow and learn through resolving our difficulties and differences ourselves. But God is not asleep. The Jewish scriptures tell us that God is biased on the side of the weak, the dispossessed, the widow, the orphan, the alien who set slaves free on an exodus to a Promised Land. It was the prophet Amos who said we should let righteousness flow like a river.

Goodness prevails in the end. The pursuit of freedom for the people of Palestine from humiliation and persecution by the policies of Israel is a righteous cause. It is a cause that the people of Israel should support. Nelson Mandela famously said that South Africans would not feel free until Palestinians were free. He might have added that the liberation of Palestine will liberate Israel, too.

Former Israeli Soldier Idan Barir on Why It's Hard to Believe Israel's Claim That It Did Its Best to Minimize Civilian Deaths

Among the difficult reports streaming in from Gaza over the past few weeks, two especially painful events have captured my attention.The first was the shelling of a UN school building in Jabaliya, where a number of families that had escaped or been forced to flee their homes had taken refuge. At least 15 civilians were killed, and dozens more wounded . Israel argued they were targeting an area from which fire had been directed at Israeli forces. The second was the bombing of a bustling market in the Shuja'iya neighborhood. At a time of precious few opportunities for civilians to safely buy food and other vital supplies, 16 people were killed and around 200 were wounded . Shops, stalls and merchandise were burned or destroyed. Harsh criticism of Israel followed each incident but -- as in the past -- Israel defended its actions, arguing that it was targeting militants and doing its best to avoid civilian casualties.

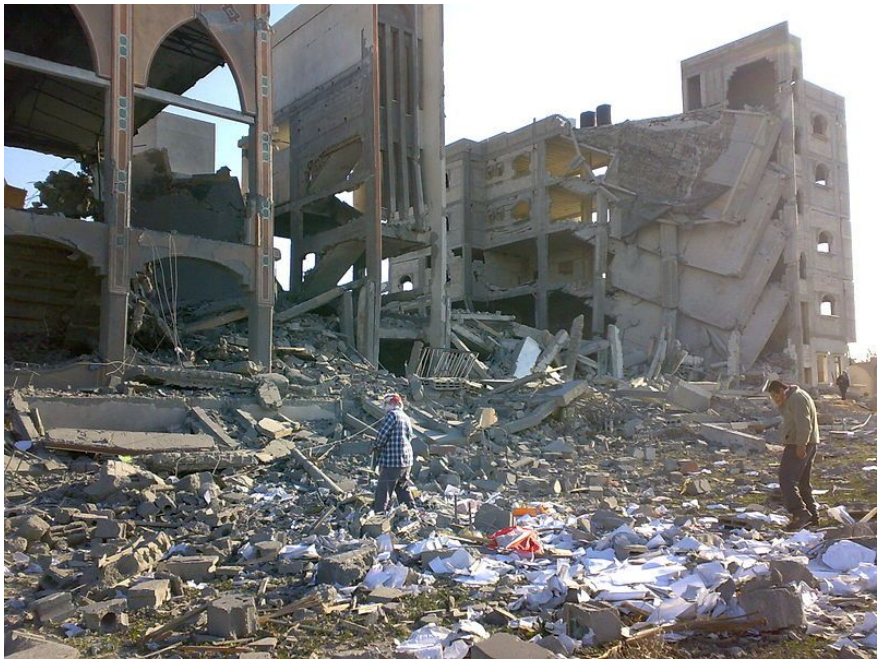
I served as a crew commander in the Israeli artillery corps at the beginning of the Second Intifada, and I feel compelled to counter this claim from Israel. The images, evidence and army reports from recent operations in Gaza -- of more than 1,900 deaths (a number which will likely increase by the time you read this) and a large amount of the population left without shelter -- show that Israel has deployed massive artillery firepower . Such firepower is impossible to target precisely. Artillery fire is a statistical means of warfare. It is the complete opposite of sniper fire. While the power of sharpshooting lies in its accuracy, the power of artillery comes from the quantity of shells fired and the massive impact of each one. In using artillery against Gaza, Israel therefore cannot sincerely argue that it is doing everything in its power to spare the innocent.

The truth is artillery shells cannot be aimed precisely and are not meant to hit specific targets. A standard 40 kilogram shell is nothing but a large fragmentation grenade. When it explodes, it is meant to kill anyone within a 50-meter radius and to wound anyone within a further100 meters. Furthermore, the humidity in the air, the heat of the barrel, and the direction of the wind can all cause unguided shells to land 30 or even 100 meters from where they were aimed . That is a huge margin of error in somewhere as densely packed as Gaza. The imprecision of this weaponry is so great that Israeli forces are compelled to aim at least 250 meters away from friendly troops to ensure their safety -- even if those troops are sheltered. In military terms, this distance is called the "safe range of fire." In 2006, when shelling was first used against the Gaza Strip, the "safe range of fire" for Palestinian civilians was reduced from 300 to just 100 meters. Shortly afterwards, a stray shell landed inside the home of theGhabeen family in Beit Lahiya, killing a young girl, Hadeel, and wounding other members of her family.

In response to this and similar tragedies, human rights organizationsappealed to the Israeli High Court of Justice to cease this lethal practice, and in June 2007 the Attorney-General announced that no more artillery fire was to be used in the Gaza Strip. But just a few years later, during Operation Cast Lead , extensive artillery fire was again aimed at the heart of the Gaza Strip. And up until the recent ceasefire, throughout Operation Protective Edge, Israel has fired thousands of artillery shells into Gaza -- causing intolerable harm to civilians and widespread destruction, the extent of which will only be fully exposed when the fighting ceases. It's true that in at least some cases, the army has informed civilians of its plans to attack a certain area and advised them to leave. But this in no way excuses the excessive damage and huge toll on civilian lives.

I write this with great sorrow for civilians hurt on both sides. Sorrow for our soldiers who have fallen in this operation, and sorrow for the future of my country and the entire region. I know that as I write, soldiers like me have fired shells into Gaza. They had no way of knowing who or what they would hit. Faced with so many innocent casualties, it is time for us to state very clearly: this use of artillery fire is a deadly game of Russian roulette. The statistics, on which such firepower relies, mean that in densely populated areas such as Gaza, civilians will inevitably be hit as well. The IDF knows this, and as long as it continues to use such weaponry, it will be hard to believe when it claims to be minimizing civilian deaths.



As a former soldier and an Israeli citizen, I feel compelled to ask today: have we not crossed a line?

As Repression Escalates on U.S. Campuses, an Account of My Ordeal With the Israel Lobby and UC

By William Robinson, Truthout | News Analysis

A building in Rafah destroyed by the Israelis during Israel's assault on Gaza in January 2009. Shortly after Israel concluded its month-long Operation Cast Lead in Gaza, Professor William Robinson was targeted for repression for including material critical of Israel in his course materials. Professor William Robinson of UCSB was the target of a campaign of intimidation, silencing, and political repression that included techniques described in the "Hasbara handbook" by the Israel lobby in contravention of academic freedom and university rules. He describes the experience here.

The latest Israeli carnage in Gaza has provoked worldwide condemnation of Israel for its continued war crimes and its illegal occupation of Palestinian territories. In response, the Israeli state and its allies and agents are stepping up campaigns of intimidation, silencing, and political repression against opponents of its policies. Israel may continue to win military battles - after all, it has the fifth most powerful military on the planet - but it is losing the war for legitimacy. In the wake of its bloody attacks on schools, hospitals and United Nations refugee centers in Gaza, support has intensified around the world for the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) campaign. The BDS campaign in the United States has taken off, above all, on university campuses, which is why the Israel lobby is so intent on targeting academia.

Five years ago, I was attacked by the Israel lobby in the United States, led by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL), and nearly run from the University of California at Santa Barbara (UCSB), where I work as a professor of sociology, global and Latin American studies. The campaign against me lasted some six months and garnered worldwide attention, but I am hardly alone. Dozens, perhaps hundreds, of professors and student groups have been harassed and persecuted for speaking out against Israeli occupation and apartheid and in support of the Palestinian struggle. Some of these cases have been high profile in the media and others have gone relatively unknown. The latest victim, Steven Salaita, a respected scholar and professor of English literature and American Indian Studies, was fired in August from the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, for denouncing on social media the most recent Israeli atrocities in Gaza.

The persecution to which I was subjected involved a litany of harassment, slander, defamation of character and all kinds of threats against the university by outside forces if I was not dismissed, as well as hate mail and death threats from unknown sources. More insidiously, it involved a shameful collaboration between a number of university officials and outside forces from the Israel lobby as the university administration stood by silently, making a mockery of

The disciplinary procedure initiated against me by UCSB officials involved a host of irregularities, violations of the university's own procedures, breaches of confidentiality, denial of due process, conflicts of interest, failure of disclosure, improper political surveillance, abuses of power and position, unwarranted interference in curriculum and teaching and so on. As I would discover during the course of the ordeal, individuals inside the university and in positions of authority had linked up with agents of the lobby outside the university in setting out to prosecute me.

Dozens, perhaps hundreds, of professors and student groups have been harassed and persecuted for speaking out against Israeli occupation and apartheid and in support of the Palestinian struggle. I may well have been run from the university if it were not for graduate and undergraduate students (together with a handful of committed colleagues), who early on in the persecution set up the Committee to Defend Academic Freedom that launched a worldwide campaign in my defense. This in turn sparked a good portion of the faculty into action, several months into the campaign of persecution against me, to defend my academic freedom. This campaign also generated widespread support for me off campus, pressure that eventually forced the university to back down and the Israel lobby to give up and move on to targets of harassment elsewhere, thereby demonstrating that this lobby is not invincible, and indeed, is increasingly vulnerable. The entire story is documented on the committee's website . During the course of the six-month campaign the committee and I were able to piece together the events that are here reconstructed - in part and in brief - to the best of my knowledge.

Operation Cast Lead and the Israel lobby's Inside-Outside Strategy

On January 18, 2009, Israel concluded its month-long Operation Cast Lead in Gaza, which left 1,400 Palestinians dead and thousands more wounded, up to 80 percent of them civilians. The following day, one week into our winter quarter classes, I forwarded to the LISTSERV for my course on the sociology of globalization optional reading materials drawn from the international press for classroom discussion that evening on the Israel-Palestine conflict. The reading materials included among other items a Reuters news article reporting that a Jewish editor of the Kansas City Jewish Chronicle had been sacked for publishing an article by a Jewish-American journalist who visited the West Bank and denounced the occupation. They also included a photo-essay that had been circulating on the internet and that juxtaposed Israeli atrocities in Gaza and Nazi atrocities in Warsaw, along with a commentary of my own, including this paragraph:

The Israeli army is the fifth most potent military machine in the world and one that is backed by a propaganda machine that rivals and may well surpass that of the U.S., a machine that dares to make the ludicrous and obnoxious claim that opposition to the policies and practices of the Israeli state is anti-Semitism. It should be no surprise that a state founded on the negation of a people was one of the principal backers of the apartheid South African state not to mention of the Latin American military dictatorships until those regimes collapsed under mass protest, and today arms, trains, and advises military and paramilitary forces in Colombia, one of the world's worst human rights violators.

My course on the sociology of globalization takes up vital and controversial issues that impact global society and each class meeting starts with a discussion of some current affair, such as Operation Cast Lead. However, two students of the 80 enrolled in the course, whom I have never met and did not know, apparently did not feel that they should receive any course material that challenged their beliefs. Instead of attending class that evening, they made contact with the Hillel organization on campus who then took them to meet with the ADL, the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, Stand With Us, and several other Jewish organizations and faculty members of campus. The ADL and these other organizations then went into action.

External monitoring and censorship of course conduct is a violation of faculty academic freedom and was not a legitimate part of the university's complaint procedure.

First, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, a Zionist organization in Los Angeles, sat down with one of the students to film her, with her face blotted out (the film stated the student "has asked to protect her identity for fear of reprisal"), as she claimed she was intimidated by my course material, and then posted the film on YouTube under the title "Jewish Students Shocked by UCSB Professor's Demonizing Email." The Wiesenthal Center called for me to be punished and accused me of anti-Semitism until they learned that I am of Jewish background, and then charged instead that I was a "self-hating Jew."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Next, the students met with the local ADL chapter in Santa Barbara, and were apparently instructed by the ADL and its affiliated groups to contact the Charges Office at UCSB and lodge a grievance against me. The Charges Office is set up by the University to receive grievances over possible violation by faculty members of the Faculty Code of Conduct (e.g., sexual harassment, racial bias, etc.). The Charges Office is expected to investigate possible violations, and to dismiss frivolous charges, that is, charges that clearly do not involve a violation of the code.

What I did not know at the time, but would soon learn, is that two of the three officers of the Charges Office belonged to the Zionist community in Santa Barbara that had already begun to combine against me, and that at least one of them, Aaron Ettenberg, had already made contact with the outside groups working with the students. Ettenberg, was a former president of the Santa Barbara B'nai B'rith, the parent organization of the ADL. Neither of these two revealed their affiliations or recused themselves due to the blatant conflict of interests. To the contrary, we would soon learn that Ettenberg met with Rabbi Arthur Gross-Schaeffer, director at the time of the Santa Barbara chapter of Hillel, a Jewish organization linked with the ADL, and an outspoken leader of the pro-Israeli Jewish community in Santa Barbara, to consult with him about my case prior to the university's decision to investigate me.

This explains why, on February 9 the director of the local ADL Chapter Cynthia Silverman sent me a letter protesting my course materials and accusing me of violating a number of items of the Faculty Code of Conduct. How did the ADL come into possession of my course material? Copies of this ADL letter were sent to my department chair, to UCSB Chancellor Henry Yang, and to then-UC President Mark Yudof (himself an outspoken Zionist). The campaign now picked up steam. Three days later, Martin Scharlemann, who was the chair of the Charges Office, summoned me "urgently" to meet with him to discuss the complaint that the students had lodged with the Charges Office. I was by told by Scharlemann's staff assistant, Stephanie Smagala, that it was "imperative" that I come down that very afternoon due to "an urgent situation." I did not understand at the time why such alarm, why Scharlemann was treating this as an emergency situation, whereas this was but a routine student grievance evidently not involving any urgent matter such as sexual assault, possible violence, or anything remotely of that nature, and strictly referred to two students' disagreement with the content of course material, a course that they had dropped.
At the same time as the university's Charges Office was organizing its prosecution, I was contacted through a mediator by Rabbi Gross-Schaeffer, who had previously met with Charges Office member Aaron Ettenberg. This mediator, a colleague of mine, then set up a confidential meeting between the two of us. "We [the Israel lobby] will pull back if you meet our conditions," he told me. You need to "ask for repentance, to apologize for what you have done." I told Gross-Schaeffer that I had done nothing morally objectionable and more so, I had not violated any rules, codes or procedures at the university and was acting fully within my rights of academic freedom. "Well apparently there are people at the university that disagree with you and are prepared to move forward against you if you do not repent," he replied.

Contriving Charges

The charges against me were entirely contrived. There is absolutely nothing in the Faculty Code of Conduct that even remotely suggests that my course material violated any item of the code. In my February meeting with Scharlemann and his staff assistant Smagala, the two asked several questions entirely inappropriate and outside of their jurisdiction, including as to whether I had placed on the course syllabus the topic of the Israeli-Palestine conflict, which suggested that the two believed they were empowered as part of the complaint procedure to examine the content of my course and to determine what was and was not relevant to that content.

Such external monitoring and censorship of course conduct is a violation of faculty academic freedom and was not a legitimate part of the university's complaint procedure. Although the materials I distributed were relevant for my course, even if they had not been, their inclusion in the course reading material would not have violated the Faculty Code of Conduct. Neither Scharlemann nor Smagala had any right to assess what was relevant for my courses on globalization (or indeed any other topics of sociology).

The charges amounted to a blatant attempt at political censorship and an illegitimate use of the university's grievance procedure. These gross violations by the Charges Office, as well as the contact between the Charges Office and outside pressure groups from the Israel lobby and other irregularities and violations of university rules and procedures as this persecution unfolded were brought to the attention of university officials of the highest levels, right up to Chancellor Yang and Executive Vice Chancellor Gene Lucas, upon whom it was incumbent to defend my academic freedom and the integrity of the university. Yang chose, however, to ignore my insistence that he and the university defend my academic freedom and put an end to what was becoming a charade. In fact, he expressed more anxiety about the harassment campaign organized by Stand With Us and its members' threats to withdraw funding from the university if I were not fully prosecuted.

A week later, Scharlemann notified me that the two students had filed formal written complaints and I was expected to reply and defend myself. The farcical and politicized nature of the attacks against me now became apparent. Here is an excerpt from one of the student complaints (the full complaints are posted on the website):

An important issue is the distinction between the legitimate criticism of policies and practices of the State of Israel, and commentary that assumes an anti-Semitic character. The demonization of Israel, or vilification of Israeli leaders sometimes through comparisons with Nazi leaders, and through the use of Nazi symbols to caricature them, indicates an anti-Semitic bias rather than a valid criticism of policy. I found these parallel images intimidating, disgusting, and beyond a teacher role as an educator in the university system. I feel that something must be done so other students don't have to go through the same intimidating disgust I went through . . . He has also violated the universities policies by 'participating in or deliberately abetting disruption, interference, or intimidation in the classroom (Part II, Section A, Number 5). Robinson has done so through this intimidating email which had pushed me to withdraw from this course and take another one . . . By Robinson using his university email account he attaches his thoughts with that of the university and they become a single entity sharing the same ideas."

The second letter repeats the accusation of anti-Semitism, a definition lifted verbatim from the U.S. State Department and then continues: In all the years of schooling and higher education I have never experienced an abuse of an educator position . . . To hide behind a computer and send this provocative email shows poor judgment and perhaps a warped personality. The classroom and the forum of which higher education is presented needs to be safe and guarded so the rights of individuals are respected. handle [sic] . . . The fact that the professor attached his views to the depiction of what my great grandparents and family experienced shows lack of sensitivity and awareness. What he did was criminal because he took my trust and invaded something that is very personal. I felt as if I have been violated by the professor. Yes I am aware of Anti-Semitism, but to abuse this position in an environment of higher education where I always thought it to be safe, until now, is intimidating. This professor should be stopped immediately from continuing to disseminate this information and be punished because his damage is irreversible.

The actual charges contained in the students' letters were simply absurd; they included a long list of charges copied straight from the Code of Conduct, including those against romantic relations with students, despite the fact that I had never met the students in question, and charges against the use of university property for commercial gain, which had no bearing whatsoever on the case. The letters of complaint, in fact, opened up with the bizarre charge that I actually violated my own right to present controversial material. They included the charge of discrimination, even though my only act for which the students submitted a grievance was to have sent reading material uniformly to the entire class, for which reason by definition discrimination was not involved. The litany of charges included also violations of the canons of intellectual honesty, speaking in private capacity while creating the impression that I represented the university, and so on. And all these accusations were generated by nothing more than an optional reading sent by internet to the entire course LISTSERV and that represented some 1/10th of 1 percent of the assigned reading material for the course.

"Apparently, they have decided enough vulnerability exists in the university community . . . They're making this (the Robinson case) into a litmus test to silence criticism of Israel."

In matter of fact, the students' grievance was based strictly on their objection to the content of course material. This fact, indeed, is not in dispute, as is apparent from the text of their letters. According to the University of California procedures, a grievance procedure is available to students who feel that they may have been disadvantaged, graded unfairly, or otherwise discriminated against on account of disagreements with the professor's views, not when the students merely disagree with a professor's views, or with the views expressed in course readings. To the contrary, the very preamble to the University's Faculty Code of Conduct states that the primary purpose of the code is to protect faculty's right to academic freedom, e.g., to protect faculty from frivolous complaints by students.

I was bewildered at the time as to why Scharlemann refused to reject the claims as frivolous. Given that there was no substantiation of the students' long list of complaints and that the only basis for the students' complaint was an optional reading they received by email that criticized the Israeli government as part of a course on global affairs, what could Scharlemann possibly have found in these student letters to have led him not to inform the students that it was frivolous? I only learned subsequently that behind Scharlemann and several other university officials involved in my persecution was the malicious intent of a web of individuals outside the university representing the Israel lobby and coordinating with the students and university officials.

For much of March and into April Scharlemann ignored my request for him to substantiate the basis of his decision to press forward rather than dismiss the case. The university waited more than two months before actually informing me of exactly what was the charge against me, that is, exactly what aspect of the Code of Conduct I was alleged to have violated. On April 5, Scharlemann sent to me what is known as a "charges sheet," which accused me of distributing "highly partisan" material to my students "accompanied by lurid photographs" and "was unexpected and without educational context," that I had engaged in "coercion of conscience" as a result of which "two enrolled students were too distraught to continue with the course."

In fact, the University's Faculty Code of Conduct nowhere states that course material must not be "partisan" or that "lurid" images are violations of the code. Indeed, not a single one of the charges against me are stipulated in the code as violations. The charges amounted to a blatant attempt at political censorship and an illegitimate use of the university's grievance procedure. I asked Scharlemann for explanations, e.g., what he meant by "lurid photos." In my letter requesting further explanation, I wrote:

'Lurid' is defined by Webster's as 'vivid in a harsh or shocking way.' In what way is the introduction of images vivid in a harsh or shocking way a violation of the Faculty Code of Conduct? Why would photos of military conflict not be 'harsh and shocking'? And why would their presentation in a University course be a violation of the Faculty Code of Conduct? . . . By suggesting that images that document shocking events and "partisan" material should not be introduced into a university course your charges sheet appears to advocate - beyond the suppression of academic freedom - outright political censorship. The Faculty Code of Conduct does not, in any way, proscribe "partisan" material or images that are vivid in a harsh and shocking way. To the contrary, the code establishes as the right of faculty the 'right to present controversial material relevant to a course of instruction' and its very Preamble states that the intent of the code is to protect academic freedom.

Scharlemann ignored my letter, and more seriously, so did all of the university administrators to whom I wrote demanding an explanation for this political persecution and demanding that the university protect and defend my academic freedom. Instead, this Charges Office proceeded to establish a special investigative and prosecutorial committee (known on my campus as an Ad Hoc Committee) to further investigate my alleged violations and apply possible sanctions.

Enter the ADL's (and Mossad's) Abraham Foxman. The Anti-Defamation League (ADL), with 34 regional offices in North American, a staff of 400, and a $32 million annual budget, is one of the core organizations of the Israel lobby in the United States, exposed by U.S. political scientists John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt in their study "The Israel lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy." The ADL has a long and sordid history of spying on, slandering and vilifying critics of Israel - victims of its infiltration have included the NAACP, the ACLU, Greenpeace, the Arab-American Anti-Discrimination League, and thousands of private citizens, among others - in cooperation with Israel's foreign intelligence service, Mossad. ADL director Abraham Foxman is an international lobbyist for Israel who has met frequently with national and world leaders, including all U.S. presidents since Richard Nixon, and who brags that he has direct access to the office of the Israeli Prime Minister.

On March 19, Foxman arrived at UCSB for a meeting hosted by Religious Studies professor Richard Hecht and attended by Deans David Marshall and Michael Young and several faculty members. Cynthia Silverman by his side, Foxman demanded that the university take action against me. Some of the meeting participants told me that Foxman requested the meeting at UCSB for the sole purpose of demanding that university officials investigate me for introducing course materials critical of Israeli state policies. In fact, the only agenda item of this meeting was my case. History professor Harold Marcuse, who attended the meeting, later stated: "When the meeting started, Foxman quickly launched into what I would call a rant about what he said was an anti-Semitic email that professor Robinson sent to his class. We then had an open discussion about Foxman's comments and the charges against Robinson. In my recollection, that was the only thing we talked about at the meeting. Nothing else was discussed."

Alongside the ADL, the organization Stand With Us launched a nationwide and worldwide campaign to pressure the university to fire me, including a petition drive and a letter-writing campaign. Stand With Us' founding mission is to counter criticism of Israel on university campuses worldwide, according to its website. Created in 2001, its site openly calls college campuses a "modern-day battlefront" for Israel. "Today Israel faces a new global threat, one that is fought in the media, on university campuses, and in the court of public opinion," reads the Stand With Us home page, while its Bay Area chapter is even more candid: "Our mission is to stand up to anti-Israel speech wherever it may surface," reads the site. "We are (unofficially) representing the state of Israel."

In late 2008, the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee announced that it would target U.S. universities, especially big state universities, starting with the University of California.

Stand With Us representatives threatened a campaign to have pro-Israel donors cut off financial donations to UCSB if I were not prosecuted. For instance, Stand With Us sent a letter to Vice Chancellor Gene Lucas dated March 16 and posted at ww.standwithus.com . The letter states that Stand With Us board member Leah Yadegar was in contact with the two student complainants. It stated that Yadegar then "distributed the email widely to UCSB donors, media, and Jewish organizations, including Stand With US," and that Stand With US board member Howard Waldow, a UCSB donor, discussed my case with Chancellor Yang at a reception.

At the time, Roz Rothstein, international director for Stand With Us, told the UCSB student newspaper, The Daily Nexus, that the campaign against me could set a precedent for more action against Israel critics at other universities. My colleague Richard Falk, who was a visiting professor of global studies at UCSB and the UN's special rapporteur on human rights in the Palestinian territories, commented at the time that Rothstein's remarks indicated a "disturbing" escalation in pro-Israel pressure on college campuses in general, and at UCSB in particular. "Apparently, they have decided enough vulnerability exists in the university community for them to mobilize pressure campaigns," Falk said. "They're making this (the Robinson case) into a litmus test to silence criticism of Israel."

Falk was right; the Israel lobby had made my case a litmus test. On the other hand, I was carried away by support from around the world as international pressure mounted on the university to put an end to my persecution. The university received letters in support of me and demanding that the charges be dropped from dozens of professional associations and community organizations, among them, the National Lawyers Guild, California Scholars for Academic Freedom, the Middle Eastern Studies Association of North America, the editorial board of the UK-based scholarly journal Race and Class, the Global Studies Association, and the March 25 Coalition, an immigrant rights coalition in Southern California. It also received petitions signed by thousands of people from around the United States and the world, and countless letters from individuals from all five continents, a sampling [http://sb4af.wordpress.com/] of which have been posted. The Committee to Defend Academic Freedom organized a teach-in on May 21 that left standing room only in the auditorium and media in attendance from around Southern California.

A Secret Absolution

The Ad Hoc Committee set up to investigate me in April concluded its investigation into me on May 15and found that I was not in violation of the Faculty Code of Conduct. Yet Chancellor Yang kept these results secret from me and from the public for another six weeks, until June 24. Since Chancellor Yang and his immediate underlings, including Vice Chancellor Gene Lucas, ignored my correspondence with them, I do not know from the horse's mouth what their motives were for continuing to apply political pressure on me for another six weeks. Were they waiting for a major Jewish donation to the university to be consummated before publicly announcing their dismissal of the charges against me? Was the Israel lobby still conspiring on how to move forward in persecuting me?

On June 10, the Foundation for Individual Rights and Education, a Pennsylvania-based nonprofit, had come to my defense in the name of First Amendment rights and academic freedom. One of their Attorneys, Adam Kissel, wrote the chancellor warning him that if all charges against me were not dropped by 5 pm on June 24, his organization would launch a major media campaign and a law suit against the University of California. An hour or so before this deadline, the university chose to inform me of the decision, made six weeks earlier and kept secret, that the charges against me had already been dropped.

But the administration was also under mounting pressure from my colleagues. Spurred on by my students, whose mobilization in my defense included a sit-in at the chancellor's office and threats of more sit-ins, an international petition drive, and other public protests, my colleagues mobilized against the improprieties. Some 100 faculty members and 20 heads of departments signed a petition protesting the university's handling of the accusations against me. And on June 8, some 80 faculty members filled a Senate meeting and passed a motion to investigate the irregularities surrounding my case. By this time, my case had garnered worldwide media attention and the university was in the spotlight as public pressure mounted. Yet the university administration refused to put an end to the witch-hunt. Instead, Chancellor Yang sent me a message via an intermediary: "Stop embarrassing the university."

"Scholars whose work is critical of Israeli policies have been denied jobs, denied tenure, and in general have their lives made difficult not because of academic criteria, but because of political interference."

Following the dismissal of charges against me, I submitted a 40-page grievance to the UCSB Academic Senate. According to the Senate's bylaws, a committee should have investigated the litany of irregularities, violations of procedure, breaches of confidentiality, conflicts of interest, failure of disclosure, improper political surveillance, abuses of power and position, and other acts of misconduct against me as a faculty member, some of which has been discussed here and all of which can be found at the website , including original letters and documents pertaining to the case. Nonetheless, the Senate chose to investigate exactly one single violation - that of Ettenberg's undisclosed conflict of interest - and then exonerated him. How did they reach this decision to exonerate? According to the Senate's letter to me in response to my grievance, they simply asked him if he had a conflict of interest and he said he did not!

Whereas the allegations against me took just a few minutes to make, and the Senate investigation into breaches of my rights took but one word to dismiss, I had to suspend my research and professional activities and put on hold my personal life for the duration of the six months, in which I had to defend myself against frivolous allegations. Indeed, across the country whenever such persecutions are launched the burden falls on those that are targeted to defend themselves, often tying up the individual's time and life for months and generating great emotional stress.

UCSB has yet to honor my demand that the institution apologize for the ordeal it put me through and the damage done to my professional reputation.

Nazi Propaganda Minister Goebbels' Tactics on U.S. Campuses

Yet that ordeal is but a fly in the face of the horrific crimes to which the Palestinians are subjected on a daily basis by Israeli occupation, apartheid, and periodic massacres. It is, in addition, something faced by dozens, perhaps hundreds, of faculty and students who chose not to back down in the face of McCarthyist repression in their commitment to speaking truth to power.

In late 2008, the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee announced that it would target U.S. universities, especially big state universities, starting with the University of California. AIPAC director Howard Kohr acknowledged at the 2009 annual convention the erosion of Israel's legitimacy, warning that there was a huge and growing international campaign against Israeli policies. "No longer is this campaign confined to the ravings of the political far left or far right," he said, "but increasingly it is entering the American mainstream".

In their 2009 article in Tikkun , University of California at Irvine professor David Theo Goldberg and UCLA professor Saree Makdsisi noted that "no fewer than 33 distinct organizations - including AIPAC, the Zionist Organization of America, the American Jewish Congress, and the Jewish National Fund - are gathered together today as members or affiliates of the Israel on Campus Coalition," whose stated objective is to generate "a pro-active, pro-Israeli agenda on campus. There is accordingly, disproportionate and unbalanced intervention on campuses across the country by a coalition of well-funded organizations, who have no time for - and even less interest in - the niceties of intellectual exchange and academic process." They note that "scholars whose work is critical of Israeli policies have been denied jobs, denied tenure, and in general have their lives made difficult not because of academic criteria, but because of political interference."

They go on to observe how this apparatus systematically uses disinformation and misinformation, blatant fabrications, character assassination, and so on. The objective is not to engage in rational dialogue based on exchange of ideas in the search for truth, but "to create an environment of fear and intimidation on and off campuses, in which any criticism of Israeli policies is subject to sanctions and censorship." Then they note:

The Hasbara Handbook: Promoting Israel on Campus, which is distributed to campus activists by organizations like Stand With Us, explains that it is often better to score points than to engage in actual arguments, and offers an explanation for how, in its own words, 'to score points whilst avoiding debate'. Point-scoring, the Hasbara Handbook explains, "works because most audience members fail to analyze what they hear. Rather, they register only a key few points, and form a vague 'impression' of whose argument was stronger." Part of the strategy is to recycle the same claims over and again, in as many settings as possible. 'If people hear something often enough,' the document points out, 'they come to believe it.

Needless to say, this was precisely the tactic developed by the Nazi Minister of Propaganda, Joseph Goebbels, which he called "the big lie ." Goldberg and Makdsisi continue:

The Hasbara Handbook offers several other propaganda devices, all of which can be seen vividly at play in the coverage of the UCLA Gaza panel and other similar events, including again, the Robinson affair. 'Creating negative connotations by name calling is done to try to get the audience to reject a person or idea on the basis of negative associations, without allowing a real examination of that person or idea,' the handbook states with remarkable bluntness, in advocating this tactic. It also suggests using the opposite of name-calling, to defend Israel by what it calls the deployment of 'glittering generalities' (words like 'freedom', 'civilization', 'democracy') to describe the country, manipulating the audiences' fears, etc.

I can attest that these Goebbelsian tactics - when backed by the economic resources and political influence of the Israel lobby and in the context of U.S. state support for, and sponsorship of, the Israeli Zionist project - are often effective. Such tactics cower many people, not just politicians, but academics who become scared to even mention any criticism of Israel or support for Palestinians in their classrooms, their research and their public appearances. I see this almost every day in my own professional work in academia, and of course in the media.

We are morally compelled to speak out against injustice, in this case, against Israeli repression, colonialism, and apartheid, even when it means we run the risk of facing the wrath of the powerful, on our campuses and in the larger society.

In my case, while some colleagues came out courageously and publicly in my defense (and many were aroused by the student mobilization to come out in support of academic freedom yet still kept themselves arms-length from me), many others, it seemed to me almost overnight, started to avoid me once the lobby placed a scarlet letter on my forehead. I became a pariah on campus. Some colleagues would literally turn the other way when they saw me; others would comment in hushed tones as I approached. Cowardly administrators avoided me like the plague, fearful of damaging their own status or security, principles-be-damned.

Political repression of the nature executed by the Israeli lobby and its agents and supporters can wreck lives and careers and leads to self-censorship among journalists, politicians, academics and other public figures. It results in a kind of perverted hegemony in the Gramscian sense - the forging of a coerced consensus, or at least the appearance of one, imposed by intimidation and backed up by the threat of sanctions.

However, that hegemony has been eroding in the face of Israeli atrocities, defiant intellectuals committed to justice such as (most recently) Steven Salaita, and the spread of the BDS campaign and other movements in support of Palestinian rights. My own case shows that Israel lobby is not omnipotent; it does not enjoy uncontested power. To the contrary, those who choose to side with justice and are willing to speak truth to power may find that they are swept away by support from all corners of the globe.

Finally, a word on academic freedom: When academic freedom is suppressed, the university becomes an indoctrination camp where truth is subordinated to ideology and power. Academic freedom is the life blood of the university. Any attack on such freedom exercises a chilling effect on the ability of the university community to engage in open debate and exchange of ideas on contemporary matters. Free speech and academic freedom are such threats to the Israel lobby, and indeed, to all anti-democratic, authoritarian, or totalitarian projects, precisely because it proscribes censorship and prohibits any attempt to limit what is and is not acceptable to research, to teach, to question and to debate, and precisely because academic freedom thrives on controversy and critical thinking.

It is no wonder academic freedom was suppressed in Nazi Germany, in apartheid South Africa, in military dictatorships in Latin America, in the former Soviet Union, in the United States - under McCarthyism and at many other times, such as the present moment - and elsewhere. Our mission as educators is to help develop citizens who can think critically and independently on the burning issues of our day, who can search out the truth without fear of what they will find. I believe this search for the truth inevitably leads us to a position of justice; silence in the face of social injustice is complicity in that injustice. We are morally compelled to speak out against injustice, in this case, against Israeli repression, colonialism, and apartheid, even when it means we run the risk of facing the wrath of the powerful, on our campuses and in the larger society.

The list would be very long of those I must thank for their principled support in 2009 for my right to academic freedom and free speech. I would like to acknowledge above all sociology graduate students at UCSB Yousef Baker (now Dr. Baker) and Maryam Griffin (soon to be Dr. Griffin), UCSB sociology professors Geoff Raymond and Verta Taylor, distinguished professor emeritus Richard Falk, Kevin Robinson and Marielle Mayorga-Robinson. Nothing will come of Israel's quiet: The dead died and the killers killed in Gaza only to ensure another brief interlude of quiet for Israelis

By Gideon Levy

The Tel Aviv Port was bustling again this weekend. A boisterous Indian food festival took place in the farmer's market and hordes of screaming children were riding the merry-go-round — a retro model with old-fashioned cars as the speakers blasted songs from yesteryear. Thousands of Israelis filled the eateries, went shopping for trifles and strolled to the sound of breaking waves. Did a war really just happen?

We still haven't reached an agreement, yet that agreement is already behind us. The papers are eking out one more round of stories on courage, and in the homes of the bereaved parents the grief is there to stay. The wounded and shock victims are recovering and the south is still apprehensive, but it's still summer and Israel is merry again.

The sirens are silent, the experts have gone and the nonsense is back. Israel is back to its bubble. Protective Edge, what was that? Was that before Pillar of Defense or after Summer Rains? A momentary sense of oppression and fear has dissipated. After all, what did Israel seek? Quiet. What else could it ask for? One or two more years of denial, repression, illusion and living a lie — but mainly inaction. This is what the masses clamored for in the biggest protest during the war — for quiet for the south. Quiet. Simply quiet. Who could be for terror and against quiet? "Send me quiet in a box, from a distant land," wrote the poet Yona Wallach.

This must be Israelis' most self-righteous and revolting demand. They want quiet and the hell with the surrounding noise and its causes. Let Gaza suffocate and the West Bank bow its head, as long as we have quiet. The victims didn't die for nothing; they died for the benefit of our quiet. The rubble didn't just pile up, it served the goal of achieving quiet. The lives of dozens of soldiers and 2,000 Palestinians were sacrificed to the phony quiet. International condemnation, fissures in our democracy, blows to our economy, thousands maimed, hundreds of thousands of homeless, the hatred over there — all in the service of Israel's quiet.
"Silence is filth – sacrifice blood and spirit for the hidden glory," wrote right-wing leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky in that song before the state was established. This was a war of choice. This was obvious when Israel launched its wild hunt for Hamas men in the West Bank after the kidnapping and murder of the three teenagers. It was a war of choice fought for nothing, as is evident now. Aside from the destruction of the tunnels, which were discovered by surprise and whose threat has been exaggerated, the war will bring no benefit to Israel. Nothing. The dead died and the killers killed only to ensure another brief interlude of quiet for Israelis. This is the price they paid, and Gaza paid a thousand times more just so Israelis could enjoy themselves at the Tel Aviv Port. If the border crossings had been opened and prisoners released before the first shot was fired, everything might have been avoided. But Israel, which always proves that it only understands force, is only ready for small concessions after the fighting. It only lets violent organizations chalk up achievements. The negotiations with Hamas are more serious than any held with the Palestinian Authority, and Israel has already given Hamas more than it ever gave PA President Mahmoud Abbas. Israel only wants quiet so it can bury its head in the sand for a few more years. Quiet in Israel during a siege of Gaza? There's no such thing. During the next quiet period, Israel once again won't lift a finger. Gaza will be forgotten and the West Bank will disappear, both the siege and the occupation. When the rockets start falling again in a year or two, Israel will awaken and complain bitterly.

How dare they? How dare they do this to us again? What gall to interrupt us just when we're strolling in the port, which Israel has and Gaza will never have. This is Israel's only goal – to maintain the present situation and sanctify the quiet. The Palestinians can go to hell. Don't disturb Sleeping Beauty during her afternoon nap, or ever for that matter.

Gaza: What does the future hold for the children?

By Kevin Connolly, BBC News

The conflict is the most deadly military operation to have taken place in Gaza since the second Intifada. For children in Gaza, living through war must seem like an habitual part of life. Is it possible to imagine what the future may hold for them? A day will come when the area around the seaside hotel we use in Gaza will be flooded with tourists, and they will marvel at the distant horrors of the past. It has happened on the Mediterranean before - look at Sicily and Tunisia after World War Two - and one day it will happen here. But it will not be any day soon.

Tourists will find Gaza waiting. The half-finished building next door already has signs offering pizza and ice cream, even though there's no pizza, no ice cream and no-one to buy them anyway. Nature has certainly done its bit. Nowhere is evening more beautiful. The sun smears the surface of the sea with copper-coloured light as though it had skidded across the waves and come to a halt on the horizon. It is at this time of day that the half-built building teems with life.

The United Nations says it is sheltering more than 250,000 internally displaced persons in their Gaza schools

Refugees from other parts of Gaza are living there, one family to a room. They probably calculated Israel would not bomb a building next to a hotel full of foreigners. The adults are quietly impressive. Women scurry between the entrances to different staircases on the hot, flat roof carrying huge kettles of boiling water. At the sound of naval gunfire they barely raise an eyebrow or spill a drop. The children fizz with energy and curiosity, singing out their names across the gap between the buildings and demanding to know ours. They quickly learn to wait until we are on air using the balcony's portable satellite dish, before shouting across. They know that our desperate requests for quiet then have to be mimed, much to their amusement.
I find myself worrying what the future holds for them. Gaza is cursed by history and geography as surely as it is blessed by nature. If you are a six-year-old in Gaza, you have already lived through three separate wars - the ugly and brutal confrontations with Israel which flared in 2008, 2012 and again this year. It is as though Gaza is a kind of junction box where the dysfunctional neural wiring of the Middle East fused a long time ago.

At present, the UN puts the current death toll of Operation Protective Edge at 1,975

British imperial forces seized Gaza from the Turks in 1917 during the closing stages of World War One, one of those victories that made the Holy Land Britain's prize - and its problem. Gaza was first bombed from the air 97 years ago in a grim and dangerous overture to a century which is ending as it began. Israeli tanks first appeared here in 1956 as part of the disaster of the Suez crisis. Although Israel returned the land to Egypt the following year. In the Six Day War of 1967

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Israel came back and has occupied Gaza - or controlled life inside it - ever since. Just as Gaza appears to have bent in every hot, historical wind to blow across the deserts here, it now seems that almost every crisis elsewhere in the modern Middle East makes life a little worse. Gaza is run by the Islamist militant organisation Hamas, an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood. At one point, Hamas appeared to be navigating the treacherous cross-currents of the Arab Spring effortlessly. It seemed able to count, at different points, on the support of Syria, Egypt and Iran - all powerful regional players.

An Israel air strike that appeared to target four boys playing on a Gaza beach sparked worldwide condemnation

Now, through a combination of misjudgement and misfortune, it can count on none of them. This is a desperate time for Hamas. Without allies - and especially without a regime in Egypt prepared to turn a blind eye to weapons smuggling - the organisation suddenly seems friendless. It does not have enough money to pay the salaries of government workers in Gaza and will struggle to replace the thousands of rockets it has fired at Israel in recent weeks. In times of peace it has no diplomatic cards to play against the Israeli government. When violence flares, as it has done this month, it can at least demand concessions in return for agreeing to stop again.These confrontations are hopelessly asymmetrical. Many of Hamas's rockets are out-of-date or home-made, compared with Israel's powerful and sophisticated weapons.

Damage to infrastructure in Gaza has been catastrophic: a power plant, schools and hospitals were hit

And yet, decisive victory seems to elude Israel, just as it eludes Hamas. The fighting will probably end in ways which are ambiguous and unsatisfactory, just as it has in the past. That will be tough on the civilians of southern Israel, who will almost certainly find themselves running for their air-raid shelters again in future. But it will be tougher still for those children on the roof next door. They have no air-raid shelters and very little chance of escaping to the wider world as long as Israel and Egypt maintain strict controls on all movement across Gaza's borders. So these thoughts do not end with some neat aphorism which offers a little hope for the future. You just wonder how long it will be before those children, who have lived through three wars, find themselves living through a fourth. And you wonder what will become of them.

John and team,

Here's the revised version with those edits:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. Increasing financing for sustainable development and decreasing financing for projects that add considerable climate risk will be essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals. That will require applying high environmental and social standards to our investments going forward. China will host the G20 next year in the midst of a growing international dialogue on sustainable investment standards. What is China's strategy for leveraging the G20, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB), the South-South Cooperation Fund, the Silk Road Fund, and other bilateral and multilateral forums to help establish common global standards in financing for sustainable development?

I'll hold until 11:00pm tonight in case folks have additional thoughts/edits. If no one pipes up with additional changes I'll send this version out at 11pm tonight. (Then Premier Li's team can get to work figuring out how to answer.)

Many thanks all for weighing in on this. Since we are submitting in advance the exact wording is quite important.

I like it, especially the use of "decreasing," which would get them pointed in the right direction (but also provide enough flexibility that they might go for it).

next year in the midst of a growing international dialogue on sustainable investment standards. What is China's strategy for leveraging the G20, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB), the South-South Cooperation Fund, the Silk Road Fund, and other bilateral and multilateral forums to help establish common global standards for sustainable financing?

Will hold on sending until I receive either a green light or additional edits.

Background notes of potential interest:

Last Friday Zhang Gaoli attended the St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in Russia and delivered remarks re China's plans for the 2016 G20. His speech was very general but did contain some positive indicators: he said G20 nations should develop new driving forces for sustainable growth of the global economy. He also focused on China's Silk Road initiative, which he welcomed other countries to join. That suggests they are at least thinking about linking these other programs in with G20.

Terminology re China hosting G20: Turkey currently enjoys talking about the fact that they hold the "G20 presidency" but thus far Chinese state press is using the term "chair" instead of presidency.

The 2015 G20 summit will be November 14-15 in Turkey. Then Turkey hands the baton to China. The 2016 summit will be in Hangzhou, China (likely next fall, exact date TBD).

Melanie

Subject: Re: Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

Makes sense to combine - and perhaps leading with G20 will draw out some responses about that, too.

- I wonder whether it's useful to nail down any specifics on high quality, e.g. investing in sustainable technologies and services, in ways that comply with high social and governance standards - the downside is the risk of getting too focused on a back and forth on governance, though could be interesting to specify each component to see if he responds to each.
- In the SDG financing world, China's official position is that ODA is still the main vehicle, so may be useful to say something to the effect of "increasing sustainable development financing, including harnessing a broader range of sources towards sustainable development is essential ". (REF recent official Chinese gov position paper on post-2015 which states: "Development financing should be enhanced with North-South cooperation serving as the main channel." This statement is a pure political play, since domestic resources are the main vehicle of SD financing and drove China's own rise, not to mention ODA is not terribly sustainable, but this line plays well with developing countries.) This may be adding too much into a single question, but thought it worthwhile to flag.

Cheers,
Molly

Subject: RE: Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

John and team,

Pete combined the G20 questions into one shorter one and added a separate one on finance. Here's some updated suggested text from Pete:

(1) As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. How will China use its G20 presidency next year to drive further progress on these two issues?

(2) Relatedly, increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

I think Pete's finance language is excellent. My one concern is that if we send 2 questions, they might pick what is easiest to respond to rather than what we would find most interesting. One option would be to combine further, perhaps as follows:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. It is in this environment that China is taking on the G20 presidency, and many observers around the world will be watching next year to see how China leverages the G20 to drive further progress on these two issues. Observers will also be monitoring whether and to what degree China leverages the AIIB to achieve these important goals. Increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

Additional thoughts/reactions from the team?

Hi Everyone—

John wants to respond on here to you all. He thinks we need to combine the two questions into one, and put a high standards sustainable finance question in.

Melanie, do we know who else is getting to ask questions?

Re: Quick Response Needed – Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang
Date: June 19, 2015

You are attending the China Center for International Economic Exchanges (CCIEE) think tank summit in Beijing June 26-27. There will be a side meeting with Li Keqiang. Around 40 guest scholars and officials will attend. You are one of the high-level conference speakers invited to attend the Li Keqiang meeting. You have also been invited to ask Premier Li a question. In that meeting only four people will ask questions (yourself included). CCIEE tells us the questions must be submitted in advance, no later than Monday evening (June 22) U.S. time. We should treat this as a hard deadline.

We suggest posing the following question:

Next year China will host the G20. Many nations around the world will be watching to see how China handles its G20 presidency and what that tells us about how China's rise will impact multilateral institutions. What does the Chinese government currently consider to be its top priorities for China's 2016 G20 presidency? As you know, 2015 is a very big year for sustainable development and climate change. We hope to see big progress this year on the Post-2015 Sustainable Development Goals and at the UNFCCC Conference of the Parties in Paris. Is the Chinese leadership thinking about how China can use its G20 presidency to unify and strengthen G20 support for implementing multilateral agendas on sustainable development and climate change?

Please share your thoughts asap (and no later than Monday evening) so that we can pass your preferred question on to Premier Li's team.

I. Meeting Format

Li will lead the meeting and do most of the talking. He has selected four people, including you, to ask questions. There is no pre-set theme for the meeting, but we have been told you are welcome to ask questions on topics including sustainable development, think tank cooperation, and economic issues.

II. Potential Participants

The meeting hosts have invited about 40 guest scholars and officials to attend the meeting. That group includes:

BAN Ki-moon, Secretary-General of the United Nations (video speech)
Romano PRODI, President of the Foundation for Worldwide Cooperation, Professor at China Europe International Business School, Former Prime Minister of Italy
Danilo TURK, Professor of International Law, Former President of Slovenia
Kevin RUDD, President of the Asia Society Policy Institute, Former Prime Minister of Australia
Sir Don MCKINNON, Chairman of New Zealand China Council, Former Commonwealth Secretary General, Former Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand
Grzegorz W. KOLODKO, Founder and Director of Transformation, Integration and Globalization Economic Research, Former Deputy Premier of Poland

WU Hongbo, Under Secretary-General of the United Nations
William BURNS, President of Carnegie Endowment for International Peace
Nubuo TANAKA, President of the Sasakawa Peace Foundation, Former Executive Director of International Energy Agency

III. Biography of Li Keqiang

<image001.jpg>Li Keqiang (Ke-chung) is the second-highest ranking official in the CCP. He is currently a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, premier of the State Council and secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. From 2008-2013, he was vice premier of the State Council and deputy secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. In this role, he oversaw a portfolio of issues including economic development, price controls, finance, climate change, and macroeconomic management. During that time, he also directed the Three Gorges Project Construction Committee and of South-to-North Water Diversion Construction Project Committee. In 2013, he became Premier of the State Council. He has focused on economic development and meeting China's growth targets. He has also led efforts to set targets for reducing energy intensity, cap coal use, and boost renewable capacity. At a meeting of the National Leading Group on Climate Change on June 12, 2015, he backed China's commitments through the UNFCCC, stating "China stands ready to work with all other parties to ensure a comprehensive, balanced and strong agreement at the upcoming Paris Conference."

Subject: Worst. Bill. Ever.

Tell Congress to reject the biggest assault ever on our air, water, lands and wildlife.

John,

The House Republican leadership has just upped the ante on their already unprecedented assault on our nation's bedrock environmental laws.

This week, as part of the Interior and Environment spending bill, House Republican leaders and other pro-polluter lawmakers are pushing a series of amendments that represent the most egregious attack ever on our air, land, water and wildlife.

The spending bill contains more than three dozen anti-environment policy measures that have absolutely no place in a budget measure, won't save the country a penny and are nothing more than giveaways to various special interest polluters.

Click here to e-mail your member of Congress. Tell them to reject this extreme assault on vital environmental safeguards that protect the air our children breathe and the water they drink.

Tell Congress to reject the biggest assault ever on our air, water, lands & wildlife.

The egregious policy provisions include measures that -- if enacted into law -- would threaten Americans' lives and well-being by blocking limits on harmful air pollution, increase pollution in sources of drinking water for 117 million Americans, cause animal and plant species to become extinct by denying them Endangered Species Act protections, and threaten the iconic Grand Canyon with toxic pollution from uranium mining. And these are just a handful of the dirty and dangerous provisions included in this legislation!

While we recognize that some spending cuts are necessary to reduce our federal deficit, the cuts in this particular legislation would have a devastating impact on Americans' health and environment. Those cuts include budget reductions of 18 percent for the EPA, 80 percent for the Land and Water Conservation Fund and 21 percent for the Fish and Wildlife Service.

Click here to e-mail your member of Congress. Tell them to reject this extreme legislation that is nothing more than a giveaway to Big Oil, Dirty Coal and other corporate polluters.

As if the underlying bill weren't harmful enough, we expect members of Congress to offer anti-environmental amendments on the floor that would wreak even greater havoc on Americans' health and environment and keep us dependent on expensive and dangerous energy sources.

Fortunately, President Obama has threatened to veto this harmful legislation, noting that a number of the measures in the bill are "ideological and political provisions that are beyond the scope of funding legislation." However, we cannot afford to let House Republican leaders push this legislation without a fight. We must expose their extreme anti-environment efforts. Click here to e-mail your representative.

McCain: I've Always Wanted Guantanamo Closed (CNN LS 06/12/08 11:30am)
JOHN MCCAIN: I was just informed of the Supreme Court decision [to give Gitmo detainee rights to trial in Federal Courts]. I haven't had the chance to read the opinion yet. It obviously concerns me. These are unlawful combatants. They are not American citizens, but um--and I think that we should pay attention to Justice Roberts' opinion in this decision, but it is a decision the Supreme Court has made. Now we need to move forward.

MCCAIN: As you know I always favored [the] closing of Guantanamo Bay and I still think that we ought to do that.

McCain Worked with Bush on the Gitmo Legislation the Supreme Court Ruled Against (CNN 06/12/08 6:36pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Dana there is political fallout, obviously, from this decision. The McCain is, at least in his past decisions, no big fan of Gitmo as it's called, Guantanamo Bay, what's the reaction to this decision?

DANA BASH: He's in no way a fan of Guantanamo Bay; he wants it closed. But despite all that, he actually was somebody who worked on the legislation and agrees with President Bush on this issue. So he was not very happy with this decision, as was pretty much every Republican. It was quite interesting Wolf, that this really fell on party lines. You had most of the Republicans saying this is outrageous, from their perspective, these people actually do have legal recourse. That it's just through the military courts, it's not necessarily through the civil courts. They say that's exactly where they should be. And democrats saying, no no no no, finally they are going to get their civil rights that are due to them. What is going to be interesting, particularly from the perspective of John McCain since he was actually involved in crafting this, is what he's going to propose doing now, given the fact that he wants to be the guy in the White House, just like Barack Obama does. And this is something that, as Jack and Jeff both pointed out, leaves a big question mark as to what happens with these people.

Highlight #2
Live Broadcast of McCain Town Hall in NYC (Fox News 06/12/08 7:00pm)
[on Iraq and the war on terror]
JOHN MCCAIN: My friends, right now we are in a struggle against a great and evil and a great threat and transcendental threat to everything we stand for and believe in it is called radical Islamic extremist you know it as well as I do. We are in two wars the central battlefield according to General Petraeus is the war in Iraq. The war in Afghanistan is long and hard and tough but in Iraq it is where we are succeeding [on taxes and health care]

JOHN MCCAIN: My Friends, there are many sharp differences between myself and Senator Obama he wants to raise taxes which I think makes the economy worse I want to lower taxes. He wants the government to make the choices for the families on health care I want the families to make the choices and not the government

[on the youth vote and ties to Bush]
FEMALE AUDIENCE MEMBER: My question is with how your campaign is going to approach the youth vote a lot of independents are being won over by the Obama campaign in many ways because of the alternative media channels that they have been using [indistinguishable] and a lot of young Republicans who would have previously been absolutely behind your campaign feel some what disassociated, disconnected with the party often times because of Bush policies and the administrations. I am wondering what your message to them is to tell them that a vote for you is a youth vote as well.

JOHN MCCAIN: Well thank you, In case I didn't mention it I respect Senator Obama and I admire his success in securing the nomination of the Democratic Party and I think he has done a very admirable job in motivating a lot of young Americans to his cause. And I congratulate him on that. And I think it is going to be a real competition for young peoples votes. One of the reason's why I go on Saturday Night Live, Jon Stewart, and MTV town halls and all kinds of other venues is so that I will have a better opportunity to communicate with young people. If you missed my skit on Saturday Night Live the other night I said the primary qualification to be President of the United States is to be very very very very old.
[Applause]
MCCAIN: That's part of it, but when I do communicate with young people and the internet of course is a major way to do that today in most respects I have got to commuinicate to them that I will give them a more prosperous and a safer world and a nation then the one that I had and that is the important aspect that is what young people want today. They want to know that I will give them a safe and a secure future. I intend to compete in the battle of Ideas and with a positive plan of action for education for training for job oppurtunities all those things that are paramount not only to all Americans but especially to young Americans as well.

[on Supreme Court nominees]
MALE AUDIENCE MEMBER: Thank you, Senator. The only thing that I disagree with you on tonight is that I think that many people in the room, including myself, do believe that you are a hero. As the father of a 10 year old and a 7 year old in a public school, I look to the future, too, and I look to what this country is going to look like. I am an Hispanic American in New York. Like many of my fellow Americans, I am conservative, economically. I am conservative socially, and I look to you as our future president to have part of your legacy be the people you appoint to the Supreme Court. What character traits are you looking for in the people that will serve for many, many years and help shape your legacy?

JOHN MCCAIN: I thank you. As we are talking about the youth vote, we are also going to have to compete for the Hispanic-Latino vote as well, and I believe I can do that. I have record in my home state of Arizona, working actively with the Hispanic community. I received over 70% of the votes, and I believe, could you tell me a little bit, a little bit more about your background, that indicates this concern, just a bit more?

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Well, certainly. I grew up here in New York, in the Bronx. When I grew up in the Bronx, I really did not know what a Republican looked like, but when I went to college and became an attorney, and, most importantly, when I became a father, and I began to look at the platforms of the party, I realized more and more that my beliefs as a Hispanic, as a Catholic, as a father, as a professional were inline with the platforms of the Republican party, and when I looked at your record in particular, Senator, that energized me. I was a McCain guy well before this campaign, and, to me I look at a person' s character, and that is why I asked what character traits you' re looking for in the supreme court justices you will be appointing?

MCCAIN: Now, I understand your question better. I think it could be epitomized to a large degree in Chief Justice John Roberts. I think he represents the kind of Supreme Court Justice -- I am sorry, initially, I had a little trouble understanding your question , but, now, I certainly do, particularly when it comes to supreme court decisions. When you mentioned that you are a social conservative, I think that is something that is also true in a lot of the Hispanic community. Justice Roberts, in my view, even though I may disagree from time to time with his decisions, I think he is the kind of person want on the United States Supreme Court. There can be two, as many as three, vacancies, two or even as many as three, and I want to make sure that any nominee that I make would be one who has a proven record of strict interpretation of the constitution of the United States and not legislate from the bench. So my answer is that I would have them, that kind of person, as my nominee, and, incredibly to me, Senator Obama voted against Judge Alito, and he voted against John Roberts. I still do not understand that, because it is the president in the result of an election who should nominate these nominations, and it is up to the congress, in my view, to ratify, if that person is qualified. Voted for Justices Ginsberg and Braier. I didn't agree with their judicial philosophy but elections have consequences. That is what elections have, and I think we should have voted, whether they're qualified or not, and, clearly, how someone could view Justice Roberts and Justice Alito as unqualified and vote against them is certainly a radical departure from the way we have generally acted in the United States Senate.

Fox Town Hall Wrap-Up: Friendly Crowd, Alienating on NAFTA and Education, and Not a Lot of Women (FNC 06/12/08 7:52pm)
SHEPARD SMITH: John McCain wrapping up a town hall meeting in Federal Hall in lower Manhattan, [...] in what turned out to be a very, a very friendly crowd. [...] I reported at the top of this hour that the campaign had told us at Fox News that the audience would be made up of Republicans, Democrats and Independents we now have received a clarification from the campaign [...] [that the] McCain campaign distributed tickets to supporters, Mayor Bloomberg who of course is a registered Republican and other independent groups. [...] So how'd he do? [...] Did we learn anything?

CARL CAMERON: That John McCain can be vigorous, that he can wander the room, he can take some fairly friendly questions—they weren't exactly spitballs or curves—and take the opportunity to go after Barack Obama as he did on tax cuts, on trade and a host of other issues. Not a lot of new policy here. But it's a fairly typical display of what a John McCain town hall meeting is. And you saw him sort of go back to one individual who asked a question, and say give me a little bit of your personal story so I can understand the context more—that's a tool he uses quite often.
JUAN WILLIAMS: I was taken by the idea that he says openly 'I'm for free trade.' Because I think that there's a possibility there that a lot of people you know hurting in terms of economic times and he says he understands [...] But he says he's for free trade. And that's a very difficult issue for him, especially in the Midwest and some of those swing states. […] The one other thing […] is when he talked about education, he said the NYC public schools were doing a good job; I think he'd get lots of argument there. […] Again, I think for lots of people who would be core Republicans, lots of people that he needs to embrace him before he can start to reach out, Shep, it might be a little off-putting to hear him be such a fan of free trade, such a fan of what everyone agrees would be public schools in need of reform.

RICH LOWRY: This is a candidate fundamentally driven by issues of character and national security. […] Those I think overshadow his positions on the issues. […] What I thought was interesting was the big dog that didn't bark. […] You had a lot of discussion of energy policy in this town hall without the 'D' word coming up. Every single elected Republican in the country right now is grabbing everyone they can by the lapels and saying 'Drill! Drill! Drill!' And that McCain is not on board with that just shows you how he is indeed a different kind of Republican for better or worse.
[…]
PATRICIA MURPHY: He I think went after the Independents; we heard a lot about peace and prosperity and reform. No mention of George W Bush, no mention of socialist issues whatsoever. […] From my perspective as a woman on the panel, that audience was about two-thirds male. If he wants to get those Clinton Democrats, he needs to do better than that.
[…]
MURPHY: I think his tone was really good. He came across as not partisan at all, certainly not angry, somebody who is very much in touch with economic issues and gas prices. […] But again, the visuals weren't so hot for him. Not a lot of women in that audience. There aren't a lot of women surrounding him on that campaign either, so I think he needs to do better than that.

McCain: The Response to My 'Not Too Important' Comment is We Need Town Halls (CNN LS 06/12/08 11:30am)
JOHN MCCAIN: [...] This is why we need town hall meetings. This is why we need to go to the American people and stand before them and have them ask the questions and us give the answers. My position on the war in Iraq has been very, very clear. Very clear.

MCCAIN: I opposed the failed strategy that was failing, argued for the strategy that's succeeding and it's winning and it's winning and the key is not to do what Senator Obama said we had to do and that is set artificial dates for withdrawal and also, to this day, refuses to acknowledge that the surge is succeeding. We are winning.

MCCAIN: So the key to it is success and withdrawal; success and withdrawal. General Petraeus has said that Senator Obama's plan could lead to disastrous consequences. He testified before congress.

MCCAIN: So we have a very clear choice here. That's what this is all about. We have a choice to pursue Senator Obama's path, which is artificial dates for withdrawal, which could lead to chaos, which could eventually lead to a wider war or stay with the strategy that is succeeding and we will be able to withdraw and we will come home with victory and honor not in defeat. That's what this debate is all about and anything else is frankly not on the major subject of what I believe and know is succeeding.

MCCAIN: In the three major cities in Iraq today, Mosul, Baghdad and Basra the Iraqi government and military are in charge with American support. That was the object of the surge. There is no disputing facts on the ground.

MCCAIN: We're now in the 800 and something or other day since Senator Obama has visited Iraq. Since--before the surge even began and incredibly he has still not asked to sit down with General Petraeus, our commanding general and be briefed by him on the situation in Iraq. I hope he will do so soon.

Olbermann Puts McCain's "Not Too Important" Quote in Context (MSNBC 06/12/08 8:48pm)
KEITH OLBERMAN: Finally tonight, as promised, a special comment on Senator John McCain's conclusion that it's not too important when American forces come home from Iraq. Thoughts offered more in sorrow, than in anger. For two full days now the Senator and his supporters have been outraged by what they see as the subtraction of context from this extraordinary remark. This is sadly, the excuse of our time for everything. Still, if the Senator claims truncation, we will correct that first.

["Not Too Important" Clip Shown]

And there's the context of what Senator McCain said. Well not quite Senator. The full context is that the Iraq you see is a figment of your imagination. This is not a war about honor and victory sir. This is a war that you, and the president you seek to succeed, conned this nation into. Yes sir, you. Of the prospect of the war in Iraq you said […]

That Senator McCain is context. You have attested to a fairly easy success, an overwhelming victory in a very short period of time in which we would be welcomed as liberators. Which you assured us would not require our troops to stay for decades, but merely for years, from which we could bring them all home, since you noted many Iraqi's resent American military presence, in which all those troops coming home will be staying there, not being injured, for 100 years, but most will be back by 2013, and the timing of the return of them is not that important. That Senator McCain is context. And that Senator McCain is madness.

McCaskill and Blitzer Swipe at McLobbyist while Discussing Senate Bill to Close Disclosure Loophole for Foreign Lobbyists (CNN 06/12/08 6:13pm)

WOLF BLITZER: On Capitol Hill, two top Senate Democrats are offering up a bill aimed at closing some of those loopholes used by lobbyists for foreign clients. Those loopholes sometimes allow the lobbyists to keep their activities secret. This is a sensitive issue for John McCain because several former lobbyists working for his campaign had past dealings abroad. Some have resigned in recent weeks.

CLAIRE MCCASKILL: This bill came about because we learned that the Iraqi government had hired lobbyists. And some of us were very offended at the idea that our tax dollars were being used to hire lobbyists to lobby us. [...] We're hoping that Senator McCain will co-sponsor the legislation. It shouldn't be controversial. These foreign entities ought to be operating in the light of day if they're trying to influence the United States.

BLITZER: So you can say that your decision and Senator Schumer's decision to introduce this legislation has nothing to do with the lobbyists who are working for the McCain campaign? It's not designed to embarrass that campaign?

MCCASKILL: It is designed to make sure, especially right now, under this economy, our dollar is so weak. Foreign companies are rushing into the United States to try to catch bargains. They're trying to buy businesses, buy land, influence our government--we need to know all about that right now. The fact that senator McCain has a lot of lobbyists working for him, and that they may have some of these clients, that is ancillary to our focus. Frankly, if Senator McCain wants to show the American people he's serious about this process, he ought to join us in this legislation.

Pfotenhauer Claims McCain's Economic Policies Will Get Economy Moving Again, Obama's Will Push Us Deeper Into Recession (FNC 06/12/08 5:10pm)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BILL HEMMER: Now to the other side where the battle is being waged on taxes in a big way. Nancy is a senior policy advisor to the McCain campaign. Good evening Nancy, welcome back here.

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Good Evening, thanks for having me.

BILL HEMMER: When it comes to taxes, the issue is this I believe. The question is, what do voters want?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well I think what voters want, is the tax policies and the economic policies that are going to get the economy moving again. Because they're worried. They're worried about rising gas prices, rising grocery prices, and they're afraid they're not going to be able to make ends meat. And I think it's absolutely clear that Senator Obama's path takes us to a deeper recession, and it's been proven in the past here, and also in other countries. Where as Senator McCain's path of low taxes, lower federal spending, and an avid and enthusiastic approach to free trade takes us to economic growth. So if you care about gas prices, if you care about those grocery prices that are driven up by energy, the cost of energy if you will, then you need to be with Senator McCain. And I just think that Senator Obama's plans are the antithesis of what we need, on the path that we need to be following. Look at the windfall profits tax that he's advocating for right now.

BILL HEMMER: Let me just interject this. The reason why I asked you that question is because it was a big topic for Barack Obama today. […]

[Video Clip]

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Basically, Senator McCain is building on what we know works, and he's doing it at a time when we desperately need it. Where as Senator Obama's raising income taxes, raising the amount of wages subject to the payroll tax, which is huge. It's going to give the U.S. what many experts believe to be, one of the highest effective marginal tax rates in the industrialized world. It's terrible economic policy, as I say, impressively bad. Where as Senator McCain's talking about lowering taxes on the productive sector of the economy, he's going to eliminate the AMT, which catches the average family that's caught in that about $2700 dollars and it's going to give them a $5,000 dollar per family credit for health insurance. He's going to keep the capital gains rate low, and remember 55 percent of the people who benefit from that make less than $50,000 dollars a year. So Senator Obama can wax rhapsodic with his rhetoric, nothings going to change the reality. His path is the wrong path, Senator McCain's path is the path to prosperity.

McCain: The Colombia Trade Agreement is Extremely Important (CNN LS 06/12/08 11:30am)
JOHN MCCAIN: [...] the Colombia Free Trade Agreement is far more important than a trade agreement. It's an affirmation or a rejection of the cooperation, friendship and enormous support that the Colombian government and people have given us in trying to stem the flow of illegal drugs into the United States of America.

MCCAIN: [If] We reject, as the speaker of the house had, even a vote on a a Colombia free trade agreement it sends a message throughout our hemisphere that we don't address the concerns and try to help our friends. Senator Obama said that he would unilaterally--unilaterally-
-renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement where 33% of our trade exists and you know what message that sends? That no agreement is sacred then.

MCCAIN: If someone declares that as President of the United States they would unilaterally negotiate it. I'm for free trade and I will stand for free trade and [incoherent] of all the difficulties and economic struggles we're in today there's a little bright spot and that's our exports and to--and protectionism does not work and it will not work and I look forward to that debate between myself and Senator Obama.

REPORTER: Tax credits for wind and solar expire this year and you've missed some critical votes on that issue. How do you plan--will you be there next time and how do you plan on voting?

JOHN MCCAIN: I think we need tax credits for the development of alternate energy. We need to invest in pure research and development but we also need very badly nuclear power. We're not going to attain energy independence nor will we reduce greenhouse gas emissions successfully without developing rapidly nuclear power plants all across this country. [...] I noticed that nuclear power is absent from Senator Obama's energy plan.

McCain Benefiting From Drop in Anxiety Over Iraq (MSNBC 06/12/08 6:45pm)

JOHN HARWOOD: Absolutely it's changing, it's responding to events on the ground. Iraq was a throbbing migraine headache for the republican party, for President Bush, for John McCain not too long ago. That's lessoned considerably, and that's good news for John McCain. But of course, to Chuck Todd's point from earlier, that just increases the onus on him to come up with an economic message. But clearly he is benefiting from the reduction in the level of anxiety. About Americans, even though they are sick of the war, it's simply not the same situation as it was a year ago.

Local News Covers McCain's Popularity Drop Due to Ties to Bush (NBC-WRC-DC, 06/12/08 6:11pm)

STEVE HANDELSMAN: McCain's approval rating has dropped in the three months since he locked the GOP nomination. Down from 45 percent to 39 percent, due in large part, say the pollsters, to McCain's ties to the unpopular President.

Tying McCain to Bush and Making This a Third Term a High Priority for Obama (MSNBC 06/11/08 5:12pm)

CHRIS MATTHEWS: […] his connection with George W. Bush, who really is one of the least popular presidents in a long time. He may look good in history books, but not right now. How does Barack deal with that or exploit that?

STEVE MCMAHON: Well President Bush has an approval rating, as you pointed out, in the low 20s, it's extremely low. John McCain has been an enthusiastic supporter of the Bush policies. He's gone from being a maverick who opposed many of those policies, like the tax cuts, he was critical of the war. To being a being a big supporter of the President's policy on Iraq and on the President's economic policies. And with people wanting a change, tying John McCain to George Bush and making this a third term for George Bush is very important for the Obama [inaudible].

CHRIS MATTHEWS: Show pictures together, put them together hugging? What do you do?

MCMAHON: Well I think you just say, let's take a look at the President's economic policies, let's take a look at where John McCain is on those policies. John McCain wants to stay in Iraq, Obama wants to get out of Iraq. He wants to continue the Bush economic policies and tax cuts, Senator Obama wants to go in a different direction. His view on health insurance [cut off].

MATTHEWS: To make your point, this is staggering.

Democrats Attack McCain's Age as It Proves to be a Major Issue on Voter's Minds (MSNBC 06/11/08 5:33pm)

CHRIS MATTHEWS: […] McCain's age could be a serious issue for voters here in the U.S. And Democrats, some say, are quietly trying to remind voters that McCain is not exactly young. Shuster does it again. Here's David Shuster with a look at that question.

DAVID SHUSTER: For democrats, it was a golden opportunity.

["Not too important" clip shown]

Within hours the Obama campaign and democrats in Congress attacked, claiming McCain implied that when troops come home is unimportant. But they quietly also used the controversy to turn to something else. McCain's age. Listen carefully.

Throughout the day, other democrats also attacked McCain by repeating the word confused, and they added words including "oblivious" and "out of touch". It's not the first time this year the language has seemed loaded. Last month in response to a McCain attack on him

Age has long been a campaign issue, and sometimes candidates have hammered their opponents over it directly.

Yesterday, on MSNBC, democrats including John Kerry insisted that by using the words "confused" as Kerry did, it was not to make McCain's age an issue.

[Kerry clip shown]

But today John McCain took issue with allegations that he is confused.

JOHN MCCAIN: I'm obviously disappointed with a comment like that.

SHUSTER: Regardless of the Senator's reaction and democrat's denials, John McCain's age is clearly on the minds of many voters. The latest NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that 10 percent found that McCain is too old, and that it's the first issue that comes to mind when they think of him.

McCain's Dilemma, Staying In Iraq is Costly and Unsafe, Incomparable to Japan/Europe (MSNBC 06/12/08 8:07pm)
DANA MILLBANK: Well McCain's got a problem here, as you pointed out, he wants to keep mentioning the word withdrawal. But, yet, his basic philosophy here is we need a long term commitment of troops, kept out of harms way, he says. And the problem with that, could be, that not only is there a financial cost, but if he's going to make the analogy to Europe and Japan and to South Korea; those are safe places, are safe places to keep our troops. It's not at all clear, that even with the success that's been made that Iraq is a safe place to garrison our troops for 20 to 30 years, let alone 100.

McCain's Bipartisan Appeal versus Unappealing Stances on Iraq and Trade (FNC 06/12/08 6:34pm)
MEGYN KELLY: Ok, let's start with this McCain virtual town hall meeting. Terry, he's trying to win over, you got to hand it to him, cause this isn't meant, so much, to get the Republicans on the fringe or even the independents. He's going for the Democrats, for Hillary Clinton supporters. Smart and will it work?

TERRY HOLT: Well there's that obvious opportunity there, only about half the people who came out of the Pennsylvania primary between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama said they would vote for Barack Obama. So there is an opportunity among Democrats there, among Clinton supporters, who might have recognized her credibility on national security issues, for example, or on other issues. But really, for John McCain, there is really only one candidate in this race people, that has a track record of working across party lines, and who has a real legitimate appeal among independents, and it's John McCain. It's not Barack Obama, who's a harsh partisan. And I think that's where John McCain has a distinct advantage, as this general election match-up takes shape.

KELLY: How bout it David? Cause McCain, in the most recent poll, suggested that Americans trust him more when it comes to foreign policy. They trust Obama more when it comes to the economy. But him more when it comes to foreign policy, and Hillary Clinton was farther to the right than John McCain when it comes to issues like the war in Iraq and Iran. So does he have a chance of winning them over?

DAVID SIROTA: Well I think, to counter the point that was just made, that John McCain is still the only candidate in the race that is for staying in Iraq for 100 or what was it, 10,000 years, he's made comments like that.

KELLY: Oh come on David, you know that's out of context.

SIROTA: I'm not spinning! He's the only candidate in the race that wants to stay in Iraq. He's the only candidate in the race that wants to continue and expand NAFTA. These are issues of major importance to independent voters, to republican voters. I mean, this is a candidate that's running on let's expand NAFTA at a time when the Wall Street Journal poll says that 72 percent of republicans want a change in our NAFTA style policies. So I think that presents a huge opening for Barack Obama on economic class issues and on the war in Iraq.

KELLY: Terry, I'll give you a quick rebuttal then I want to move on to topic two.

HOLT: Well NAFTA was in 1994, it's 2008. John McCain's always going to put America first, he's going to put the country first, and we need to open new markets so we can create jobs in this country and people can continue to have prosperity in their lives. We need to get this economy going.

McCain's Media Darling Status Scrutinized (MSNBC 06/12/08 8:14pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: Has the McCain campaign successfully intimidated the media at this point?

RACHEL MADDOW: The McCain campaign has two things going on with the media. One is, behind the scenes they are being very aggressive in terms of lobbying the media, lobbying the media left, right, and center in terms of the way they want McCain to be spoken about. They are lobbying the media, for example, on taxes. Saying, that we should be describing, members of the media should be describing what Barack Obama wants to do in terms of rolling back Bush's tax cuts as a tax increase, not as a rollback on Bush's tax cuts. And some members of the media go along with that sort of thing. I think some others, more rightfully see that as the subject of a news story as John McCain's trying to manipulate the media. But the other thing he's got going for him is essentially his 26 years in Washington, having been a media darling of the media on purpose. He cultivated a relationship with the media that involves them giving him the benefit of the doubt. Like you were talking about with Howard Fineman earlier, this sort of leeway that he's given, so that we talk about what he really meant rather than what he really said. The only way you get to that sort of relationship with the media is if you have a relationship with reporters that you think you can call on that supersedes your actual record and what you are documented as actually saying.

Subject:	[big campaign] McCain lies about bomb Iran joke

Bill Bennett repeated the lie on CNN after the debate.

McCain was not joking with a group of veteran buddies. His comments came at a town hall event in South Carolina where media reports did not identify an audience member who asked McCain if he would attack Iran. McCain said later that he was joking with veterans, but that does not appear to be the case, and when the media followed up, he made another incredibly insensitive remark.

CNN reported , at an April 18, 2007 campaign event in South Carolina: "McCain was asked if there is a plan to attack Iran. McCain began his answer by changing the words to a classic Beach Boys' song. "You know that old Beach Boys song, Bomb Iran?" the Republican presidential candidate said. Then, he sang. "Bomb bomb bomb, bomb bomb Iran."

According to CNN:

He finished his answer by discussing the Iran's nuclear ambitions and the country's desire to wipe Israel off the map to emphasize the real dangers that it poses to the world.
"The senator was adding levity to the discussion and the crowd reacted with laughter," campaign spokesman Kevin McLaughlin said. "He went on to discuss the seriousness of issue."

NPR had this report:

April 20, 2007 · Republican presidential contender Sen. John McCain (AZ) joked about bombing Iran this week during a campaign appearance in Murrells Inlet, S.C.

McCain was asked by an audience member about possible U.S. military action in Iran.

"How many times do we have to prove that these people are blowing up people now, never mind if they get a nuclear weapon. When do we send them an airmail message to Tehran?" a man in the crowd asked.

In response, McCain said, "That old, eh, that old Beach Boys song, Bomb Iran" — which elicited laughter from the crowd. McCain then chuckled before briefly singing — to the tune of the chorus of the Beach Boys' classic "Barbara Ann" — "Bomb, bomb, bomb, bomb, anyway, ah ...."

The audience responded with more laughter.

The AP reports that McCain was asked Thursday about this and the attention it's getting and had this to say:

"Please, I was talking to some of my old veterans friends," he told reporters. "My response is, Lighten up and get a life."

When reporters asked if the joke was insensitive, McCain said: "Insensitive to what? The Iranians?"

Hillary Clinton: "The Same Networks That Help Organize Movements For Freedom Also Enable Al-Qaida To Spew Hatred And Incite Violence Against The Innocent." "Because amid this unprecedented surge in connectivity, we must also recognize that these technologies are not an unmitigated blessing. These tools are also being exploited to undermine human progress and political rights. Just as steel can be used to build hospitals or machine guns, or nuclear power can either energize a city or destroy it, modern information networks and the technologies they support can be harnessed for good or for ill. The same networks that help organize movements for freedom also enable al-Qaida to spew hatred and incite violence against the innocent. And technologies with the potential to open up access to government and promote transparency can also be hijacked by governments to crush dissent and deny human rights." Agree with Jake. Man this is tough. Is there evidence that bad guys -- not just dissidents but terrorists or whatever -- have also benefitted from the technologies supported by the Internet freedom agenda? Either way, I think the talking points Jake put down, from Ben, stay the same.

On Nov 18, 2015, at 11:53 AM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Adding Tony and Sara S, and others from comms. This is going to be a challenge. I think we should give a comment on the anonymizing tools and punt on backdoors (she'll have more to say on that tomorrow).

On anonymizing tools, Ben Scott has suggested the following talking points. Boiled down, the points are:

1-The bad guys could already get crypto -- we helped the good guys get it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2-The Internet Freedom investments in these technologies were strongly bipartisan (and remain so).

Talking Points:

➢ Secretary Clinton's Internet Freedom agenda is a signature achievement at the State Department. She elevated human rights in a digital era to the top tier of foreign policy issues and built a new kind of diplomacy around harnessing the power of technology to serve the foreign policy goals of the United States.

➢ The Internet Freedom programs that invest in software development were designed to help people help themselves. Authoritarian governments will not willingly grant freedom of expression or the right to privacy. But technology can empower people with secure communications tools.

➢ Making secure communications tools usable for the average citizen in authoritarian societies was a central goal of Secretary Clinton's. She achieved that goal. The latest generation of Internet Freedom technologies is so user-friendly that even Silicon Valley giants have taken up the tools built by tiny NGOs.

➢ Of course, the leaders of America's Internet Freedom policies are aware that secure communications technologies can cut both ways. Providing people with tools powerful enough to resist intervention by their own governments means that our own security services will be challenged as well. This question was thoroughly reviewed and debated at the time the Internet Freedom agenda was launched.

➢ Secretary Clinton joined the consensus view of Congressional leaders from both parties that supporting Internet Freedom technologies requires uncompromising commitment to the security of users. And while we will do all we can to support the work of law enforcement, the steadfast protection of fundamental rights around the world puts us on the right side of history.

➢ A bipartisan group of Congressional leaders have supported and funded these programs for many years. Since 2008, Congress has appropriated more than $200 million to enable these innovative Internet Freedom programs. Since 2014, under Republican leadership in Congress, the annual allocation for Internet freedom programs has increased to $50.5 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

➢ Following Secretary Clinton's push for Internet Freedom, uptake of these Internet Freedom tools has grown from hundreds of thousands of regular users to more than 900 million people in 60 countries who use these technologies to exercise their rights in the digital world.

Clinton Guru Podesta' Brother Lobbied for Scandal-Ridden Uranium One

By: Ben Shapiro

If you love the team that put together the Clinton Foundation and all of its various corrupt dealings with foreign nations, you'll love the Hillary Clinton 2016 campaign. It now turns out that John Podesta, chair of Hillary's presidential campaign – and the same man who called the allegations of Peter Schweizer's Clinton Cash "conspiracy theories" – has a brother who runs a company, The Podesta Group, that lobbied the State Department on behalf of Uranium One while Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State and beyond.

Uranium One is, of course, the uranium firm that sent a "flow of cash" to the Clinton Foundation as the Russian government gained increasing ownership of the company; the State Department had to sign off on the Russians' encroachment into the American uranium market. The Clinton Foundation did disclose its relationship with Uranium One in Hillary's State Department disclosures. According to the Daily Caller, Uranium One "paid the Podesta Group $40,000 to lobby the State Department, the Senate, the National Park Service and the National Security Council for 'international mining projects,' according to a July 20, 2012 filing."

Hillary's relationship with John Podesta goes back to the first Clinton administration. During Bill Clinton's second term, Podesta acted as chief of staff. After leaving, he created the Center for American Progress, a Clinton-backed leftist think tank designed to forward the political goals of the Clintons. As the Christian Science Monitor reported when Podesta joined Hillary Clinton's campaign back in January:

Podesta is the guy people call on when the going gets tough: He served as Bill Clinton's chief of staff from 1998 to 2001, helping control a series of crises including Clinton's impeachment trial. The Obama administration brought him on to help the President steer a path through Congressional impasses and to avert embarrassments like the Affordable Care Act's botched rollout.

Podesta's relationship with the Clintons didn't waver during Hillary's time in the White House; his own ties with the Obama administration grew stronger when he became a senior advisor to the Obama administration in late 2013, before resigning this year to join Hillary's campaign.

Podesta isn't the only member of the Clinton team embroiled in Clinton Foundation corruption. Hillary's new top fundraiser is Dennis Cheng, the former chief development officer for the Clinton Foundation, which means he did all the fundraising for that organization. Cheng has not been asked any questions thus far about his relationship with the Clinton Foundation or the new Clinton 2016 campaign.

Just as President Obama magically transformed his campaign organization, Obama for America, into a political action group, Organizing for Action, to lobby for his preferred governmental policies, Hillary Clinton has transformed the Clinton Foundation and its constellation of allies into her 2016 campaign.

In Split Role, McCain Adviser Is Sometimes a Lobbyist (NYT 8/14/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
When Senator John McCain led a Senate investigation three years ago of Jack Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist who later pleaded guilty to fraud charges, Mr. Abramoff's old firm turned to a former McCain campaign adviser for help. The firm, Greenberg Traurig, which had quickly cut its ties to Mr. Abramoff, hired Randy Scheunemann, who had been the McCain campaign's foreign policy adviser in 2000 — and is again this year — for advice on handling the Senate investigation.

Did Scheunemann Engineer McCain's 2005 Nobel Prize Nomination Of Georgian President For Financial Gain? (ThinkProgress 8/13/08)
...there appears to be more evidence of Scheunemann using McCain for financial gain. In 2005, operating as Georgia's lobbyist, Scheunemann may have engineered McCain's nomination of Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili's for the Nobel Peace Prize just before his contract with the Georgian government was due to expire.

McCain: 'In the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations.' (Think Progress 8/13/08)
In recent days, Sen. John McCain's (R-AZ) rhetoric toward Russia has mostly been overblown bluster, including an accusation that the country wanted to restore its old empire. However, since a cease-fire was announced and his predictions were proven wrong, McCain has backtracked, saying there won't be a Cold War. To justify his new position, he told reporters in a press conference today:

Social Security Too Hot to Touch? Not in 2008 (NYT 8/14/08)
By LARRY ROHTER
Ignoring the warnings that Social Security can derail political careers, Senator John McCain has infuriated his party's right wing by saying that "everything has to be on the table" in discussions about keeping Social Security solvent. Mr. McCain, the presumed Republican presidential nominee, does indeed seem to have put everything on the table. In the space of one week, he opened the door to an increase in Social Security taxes, denied he would raise payroll taxes and then, through an ally, called a tax increase a "dumb idea." He has also sowed confusion about whether he favors privatizing Social Security, or continuing with the current system.

Ralph Reed's link to McCain brews storm of criticism (Atlanta Journal-Constitution 8/14/08)
By AARON GOULD SHEININ
Ralph Reed's involvement in an upcoming Atlanta fund-raiser for John McCain has the presidential candidate fending off an onslaught of criticism from Democrats. Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition, was tied to the corruption scandal involving Jack Abramoff, the highly paid Washington lobbyist now serving a six-year prison term. Much of the Abramoff scandal was exposed by an investigation led by McCain when he chaired the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs.

We Are All Georgians (WSJ 8/14/08)
By JOHN MCCAIN; Page A13
For anyone who thought that stark international aggression was a thing of the past, the last week must have come as a startling wake-up call. After clashes in the Georgian region of South Ossetia, Russia invaded its neighbor, launching attacks that threaten its very existence. Some Americans may wonder why events in this part of the world are any concern of ours. After all, Georgia is a small, remote and obscure place. But history is often made in remote, obscure places.

Russia's invasion of Georgia strikes at the heart of Western values and our 21st-century system of security. The Wrong Force for the 'Right War' (NYT 8/14/08)
By BARTLE BREESE BULL
BARACK OBAMA and John McCain have plenty of disagreements, but one thing they are united on is promising a troop surge in Afghanistan. Senator McCain wants to move troops to Afghanistan from the Middle East, conditional on continued progress in Iraq. Senator Obama goes much further, arguing that we should have sent last year's surge to Afghanistan, not Iraq, that Afghanistan is the "central front" and that we must rebuild Afghanistan from the bottom up along the lines of the Marshall Plan.

Why Can't Candidates Be Celebrities? (TIME 8/14/08)
By MICHAEL GRUNWALD
John McCain's campaign has been working overtime to ridicule Barack Obama as The One, the rock-star celebrity with adoring fans, the politician with the chutzpah to announce his candidacy in a speech about Abraham Lincoln. So it was a bit surprising to watch the opening of McCain's town hall meeting in York, Pa., on Tuesday. ...What's not such a good thing is the way campaign culture tries to slap down candidates who don't seem to fit someone's definition of "ordinary Americans." One would think the presidency would require a rather extraordinary American, but modern candidates are apparently supposed to pretend to be just like us.

Israel Withdraws Troops, 72-Hour Gaza Truce Begins

Israel pulled its ground forces out of the Gaza Strip on Tuesday and started a 72-hour ceasefire with Hamas mediated by Egypt as a first step towards negotiations on a more enduring end to the month-old war. Minutes before the truce began at 8 a.m. (0500 GMT), Hamas launched a salvo of rockets, calling them revenge for Israel's "massacres". Israel's anti-missile system shot down one rocket over Jerusalem, police said. Another hit a house in a town near Bethlehem in the occupied West Bank. There were no casualties. Israeli armour and infantry withdrew from the Gaza Strip ahead of the truce, with a military spokesman saying their main goal of destroying cross-border infiltration tunnels had been completed. "Mission accomplished," the military tweeted.

Netanyahu Applauds Destruction of Gaza Tunnels , But Still Wary of Threat

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu issued a statement Tuesday praising the IDF and Israel Security Agency (Shin Bet) for neutralizing the terror tunnels from Gaza, but reiterated that there is no guarantee of 100 percent success. “This was a complicated action taken by heroic soldiers under difficult combat conditions,” Netanyahu said. He said the tunnels' destruction harmed a strategic Hamas weapon in which they invested tremendously over the years. The tunnels would have allowed Hamas to kidnap and murder numerous civilians and IDF soldiers in simultaneous attacks from a number of different tunnels that penetrated into Israel.

U.S. Diplomacy on Gaza Has Little Sway on Israel

When the State Department condemned Israel’s strike on a United Nations school in Gaza on Sunday, saying it was “appalled” by this “disgraceful” act, it gave full vent to what has been weeks of mounting American anger toward the Israeli government. The blunt, unsparing language — among the toughest diplomats recall ever being aimed at Israel — lays bare a frustrating reality for the Obama administration: the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has largely dismissed diplomatic efforts by the United States to end the violence in Gaza, leaving American officials to seethe on the sidelines about what they regard as disrespectful treatment.

Hard-Liner Rivlin to Become Israel's Next President

Palestinian Foreign Minister Riad al-Malki said there was "clear evidence" of war crimes by Israel during its offensive in Gaza as he met International Criminal Court prosecutors on Tuesday to push for an investigation. Malki visited The Hague shortly after Israel and the Palestinian Islamist Hamas movement that rules Gaza entered a 72-hour truce mediated by Egypt in an effort to pave the way for an extended ceasefire.

Hamas: We Destroyed Israel's Deterrence

Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri said Tuesday that one of the main results of the operation was "the destruction of Israeli deterrence." "The Palestinian people now have confidence in their ability to stand firm and fight," he added. Meanwhile, Hamas officials told Hezbollah-affiliated Lebanese newspaper Al-Akhbar on Tuesday that "despite the fact the al-Qassam Brigades are bound by the ceasefire, they won't be afraid to respond to any infiltration or ground operation, even if it requires operating beyond the border." Hamas official Ismail Radwan said the Islamist movement agreed to a ceasefire "on the condition the other side fills all of its terms and stops all forms of aggression in the Gaza Strip."

Gaza Minister: War Caused $5 Billion Worth of Damage

Gaza minister accused Israel of causing over $5 billion worth of damage in the Gaza Strip since its military launched a large offensive there on July 8, Palestinian media reported. Mufeed al-Hasayneh, the minister of public works, said tens of thousands of homes had been completely or partially destroyed, and that infrastructure in the Strip had sustained severe damage as well, the Palestinian news agency Ma’an reported Monday. “The three areas that have undergone the most intense destruction are Shejaiya, Beit Hanoun, and Abasan,” Hasayneh said.

Lieberman Slams Plan to Involve Mahmoud Abbas in Gaza

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman is opposed to integrating Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas into any arrangement in the Gaza Strip following the cease-fire. Lieberman presented this stance at a Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee meeting on Monday, a senior Israeli official said. "To think of Abu Mazen [Abbas] as an ally in the Gaza Strip is a serious mistake," Lieberman said during the meeting. "Abu Mazen may act against Hamas in Gaza, but he also acts against us in the international forums. It is he who pushed the United Nations Human Rights Council in Geneva to establish a commission of inquiry and he who is pushing for processes against us in the UN Security Council in New York."

Obama Signs Funding Package for Israel's Iron Dome

President Barack Obama signed a bill Monday granting an additional $225 million in US taxpayer dollars for Israel's Iron Dome missile defense system. The defense system has been highly effective in the current round of violence between Israel and Hamas militants in the Gaza Strip. It allows Israel's military to shoot down incoming rockets or mortars headed toward major population centers in Israel. Israeli officials say it has a success rate as high as 90 percent. The US has provided hundreds of millions of dollars for Iron Dome in the past. The new package is intended to replenish Israel's capabilities.

Time for Netanyahu to Make Peace in Gaza

By David Ignatius

Now it's Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's turn to show that he has the vision and leadership to build a durable cease-fire that could empower Palestinian moderates and begin building a pathway from the hell on earth that is Gaza.

Many people, including me, sharply criticized U.S. Secretary of State John F. Kerry a week ago for seeking a quick Gaza cease-fire that would have strengthened Hamas and its allies, Qatar and Turkey. Hamas didn't deliver, the fighting resumed and the process had the effect of undermining moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Kerry was widely attacked, especially in Israel.

Kerry isn't the problem today, however. Over the past week, he has been crafting a cease-fire plan that seeks to stabilize Gaza under the leadership of Abbas and the moderate Palestinian Authority. After an initial truce, negotiators would gather in Egypt for talks about Gaza's future. Abbas would select the members of the Palestinian delegation, and the authority (with the support of the international community) would have overall responsibility for the rehabilitation of Gaza. The Palestinian delegation is already in Cairo, waiting for the talks to begin. It's headed by Azzam al-Ahmad, a leader of Abbas's Fatah movement and the person who brokered the reconciliation agreement in April between Fatah and Hamas.

Israel wants quiet in Gaza, but it seems undecided now whether it wants to negotiate a broader peace agreement. The Israelis agreed to a cease-fire Monday, and there were news reports that the country had agreed to an additional 72-hour truce. But the cabinet had reportedly decided over the weekend against joining the Cairo talks. Hopefully, Netanyahu will seek a broader deal that might reduce the likelihood of future conflict.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The thrust of Kerry's new plan is to leverage Hamas's unity pact with Fatah and its pledge to transfer authority in Gaza to the authority. As a first step, the Palestinian Authority and its U.S.-trained security service would assume responsibility for policing the Rafah crossing from Gaza into Egypt, as well as the passages into Israel. That's a big deal, as it would give Abbas's security chief, Majid Faraj, control over the most strategic ground in Gaza.

The authority would begin paying the salaries of Palestinian civil servants in Gaza, assuming that the details could be worked out. The agreement might also move toward disarmament of all terrorist groups in Gaza by building on a promise Hamas made in a 2011 unity plan that the Palestinian Authority's security service would be the only armed force in Gaza. This would also uphold Abbas's insistence on "one government, one law, one gun."

In all these ways, Kerry is now headed in the right direction — away from strengthening Hamas and toward empowering the moderates on whom hopes for a more stable and secure Gaza depend.

The question is whether Netanyahu has the courage and political clout to move in the same direction, toward a new framework for Gaza, rather than return to the battered status quo ante — with continued Hamas rule and the recurring wars that some Israelis have described as "mowing the lawn."

It will be hard for the Israeli leader to embrace this new vision for Gaza because he would have to reverse his earlier opposition to the Fatah-Hamas reconciliation agreement, which he denounced as an embrace by Abbas of Hamas's terrorist ideology. Netanyahu would also have to be prepared to truly open Gaza to the free flow of people and goods in return for disarming the terrorist groups. Netanyahu faces a real leadership dilemma. He has prevailed over Hamas and its tunnels in Gaza, albeit at a terrible cost to Palestinian civilians. But his popularity at home is dropping, with his approval ratings down 20 points from their peak of 82 percent when he ordered the ground invasion. Though Netanyahu may not realize it, he needs Kerry's diplomatic help to consolidate the gains of the war. The question is whether the Israeli leader has the boldness to leverage his military success in a way that brings greater lasting security for Israelis, and reduces the Palestinian suffering in Gaza.

Israel's continued refusal to attend the peace talks in Cairo would mean returning to the status quo ante and waiting for the next round of fighting. It would be a mistake. Netanyahu could open new opportunities by treating Abbas as a real partner — starting by helping him to gain control of Gaza. Netanyahu can go down in history as the statesman who achieved greater security for Israelis as well as a measure of dignity for Arabs.

History shows us that in the aftermath of Arab-Israeli wars, there are rare opportunities for diplomacy. Kerry, stung by the criticism that his peacemaking was helping Hamas a week ago, appears ready for such a creative moment now. Is Netanyahu?

Arab Turmoil Makes Israel Reckless and Complacent

By Gideon Rachman

When last week I saw a White House spokesman say that Israel's bombing of a UN school was "totally indefensible", I briefly thought that I had witnessed something new. Surely the Americans had never before been that strong in condemning Israel? But a colleague with a longer memory reminded me that Israel's siege of west Beirut in 1982 had provoked President Ronald Reagan (yes, Reagan) to telephone Menachem Begin, the Israeli prime minister, and accuse him of perpetrating a "holocaust". There is nothing new about Israeli military action killing hundreds of civilians. There is also nothing new about the international outcry it provokes.

In the 32 years since Reagan called Begin, the Berlin Wall has fallen, the Soviet Union has collapsed, China has been transformed, apartheid has ended and the internet has revolutionised communication. But the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has rolled ever onwards – with two intifadas, three invasions of Gaza, further wars in Lebanon and innumerable failed peace initiatives.

While the Israelis and the Palestinians remain locked in bloody conflict, however, the region around them is changing fast. For the moment, those changes are actually making Israel less vulnerable to international condemnation. In the longer term, shifts in global power suggest that Israel's future will be bleak, particularly if it does not make peace with the Palestinians.

For now, Israel is benefiting from the fact that the Arab world, which has acted as the chief advocate for the Palestinians in previous conflicts, is ripping itself apart. Syria and Iraq are engulfed by conflict, and Libya is in turmoil. The Egyptian government itself has killed hundreds of supporters of the Muslim Brotherhood in Cairo and regards Hamas as an offshoot of the Brotherhood. Saudi Arabia, the other big power in the Arab world, is also deeply hostile to Hamas.

Outside the region, geopolitical shifts are taking the edge off the anti-Israel backlash. The governments of Russia, India and China are deeply concerned about the threat of radical Islam at home. Last week more than 100 people were killed in the Chinese province of Xinjiang, after fighting provoked by Muslim separatists. Russia also has 20m Muslim citizens and, after waging two brutal wars in Chechnya, is paranoid about Islamist militancy. Narendra Modi, India's prime minister, is a Hindu nationalist, who himself is accused of connivance in anti-Muslim violence.

These political shifts are not reflected in official diplomacy. China, Russia and India voted in favour of an investigation of possible Israeli war crimes in Gaza, at the recent session of the UN Human Rights council. (EU countries abstained and the US voted against.) But there is something formulaic about the condemnation. An Israeli official says that in high-level meetings between Israeli and Chinese leaders, the Chinese spent "roughly 20 seconds" on Palestine. Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister, and President Vladimir Putin of Russia get on famously.

Yet while Israel's traditional enemies are becoming less hostile, its allies are becoming less friendly. The relationship between Mr Netanyahu and US President Barack Obama is chilly – and some Israeli officials are openly contemptuous of John Kerry, the US secretary of state. Opinion polls in the US also suggest that young people are much less sympathetic to Israel than older groups are. However, such shifts may take decades to filter through into US policy. Israel's position in Washington is deeply entrenched. The US Senate voted unanimously to support the Gaza assault and the Obama administration has combined its condemnation of Israeli actions with continued aid and arms sales.

Many European leaders are openly appalled by Israel's actions in Gaza and Europe's large Muslim population has been at the forefront of anti-Israel demonstrations. But Europe's Muslims are an often marginalised and unpopular group. Manuel Valls, the French prime minister, has condemned anti-Semitic demonstrations which he says have fused the "Palestinian cause, jihadism, the detestation of Israel and the hatred of France". Any such fusion helps Israel because it reduces sympathy for the Palestinians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Israel has long been concerned about the possibility of EU sanctions. But the measures under discussion, for example banning imports from illegal Israeli settlements, would be largely symbolic in their impact. Surveying this global picture, Israel seems to have decided that it can afford to ignore international condemnation of the Gaza war. That calculation may prove correct, as far as the current conflict is concerned.

But the political shifts that are now helping Israel look much more ominous in the long run. Turmoil in the Arab world may briefly have produced a constellation of forces that is helpful to Israel. But that situation could easily change. And some of the rising forces in the region – most obviously Isis in Iraq – make Hamas look moderate.

More broadly, a relative decline in US power is bad news for a country that is, in cultural terms, an outpost of the west. America's willingness to entangle itself in Middle Eastern conflicts is declining. That means that, long term, Israel's security can only be guaranteed by achieving peace with its neighbours. Reducing Gaza to rubble and killing hundreds of civilians every few years makes that prospect ever more distant.

But a security-obsessed Israeli government, backed by an ever more rightwing public, seems to have given up thinking about the long term.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Kansas City, MO 07/17/08

Hello All,
Just off the phone with our tracker Jacob who is on the ground in Kansas City, MO today. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Sepeatedly says "we've succeed in Iraq"
- Says we need more troops in Afghanistan
- Says we "should fund" stem cell research, though hopefully skin cell research will make this debate "academic"

Kansas City, MO - McCain Town Hall Meeting 07/17/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

BACKGROUND DETAIL
* 1000 – 1500 peeps
* Exceptionally enthusiastic crowd
* A 'Straight Talk TOWN HALL' sign
* Large American flag, big even for a McCain eventt
* Another sing that says, 'KANSAS CITY WELCOMES JOHN MCCAIN'
* Opened with prayer, followed by pledge of allegiance

Opening Remarks

- question of what kind of change are we having in DC, the right change, not the wrong change. not rhetoric.
- starts with gas prices. you need a break from the gas tax. it hurts the lowest-income Americans first
- Congress should say today that we're going to lift the ban on offshore oil drilling.
- we should get it done immediately. and i understand some states don't want to do that.
- energy is an enviro issue, economic issue and security issue.
- we need exploration and exploitation of our own fuels. but we also need altnernative.
- Nuclear power is crucial. it's safe.
- Obama opposes nuclear power. he should change his official seal to 'no we can't' or 'no we won't'
- We need to keep taxes low
- we need to talk about health care, education.
- but more so, Iraq and Afghanistan-- it's popped up a lot in the last few days. Dems like Reid and Obama all said the war was lost. After 9/11 America was on the brink of defeat and we were about to lose a conflict and lose a war. And i was trying to secure the GOP nomination. And i said we needed a new strategy and many pundits said my political ambitions were at an end.
- Petraeus's strategy has succeeded. even though the success is fragile and could be easily reversed if we did what Obama wanted, I'm confident we'll win this war.
- obama has never asked to sit down with Petraues, he's been to Iraq once, he's never been to Afghanistan, he's never acknowledged Iraq strategy has succeeded.
- I was very interested that Obama announced his strategies BEFORE he went. I usually issue my policy statements when i get back. I hope he'll sit down and understand what's at stake here.
- What happens in Iraq affects Afghanistan. Yes we need more troops in Afghanistan.
- "I'm happy to tell you we have succeeded in Iraq" and unless we reverse this winning strategy, we'll win this war. It can't be an artificial timetable for withdrawal.
- I can inspire Americans to serve a cause greater than themselves. I have that record. Many years ago, I was in a prison camp in North Vietnam, and they said I could go home early because my dad happened to be an admiral. but code of conduct said otherwise. so i put my country first.

Question & Answer

- 1Q) Obama has a record of protecting sex offenders. What would you do to protect America against onslaught of a sexualized culture?
    - MCCAIN: I don't know of that record of Obama's and I believe him for not having that. But technology makes this a more dangerous world. Internet child pornography is enabled. Human trafficking is increased. But it also comes back to the family and the parents. And i will do everything to address this terrible issue. I am proud of my record of protecting the rights of the unborn. This is a great difference between myself and Obama. Obama voted against a ban on partial-birth abortions, "that's a hideous procedure"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 2Q) I lost my nephew in Iraq. I don't want it to be in vain. How will you achieve the goals of winning in Iraq from a Dem congress?
    - MCCAIN: i see your nephew was killed in fallujah; that was one of the great battles in American history.
    - I believe I can convince my colleagues based on the facts on the ground. the facts on the ground are clear. A lot of pundits and Dem politicians said the war was lost, but most Americans are smart know that we are succeeding adn "we have succeeded in Iraq" rather than the losing strategy saying we'll withdraw. theyre the same people who said we would fail. they were wrong then and wrong now. I know Americans' frustrations wanting to get out. I want to get out too but with honor.
    - As soon as i do that, i will stop this wasteful pork-barrel spending in Congress.

- yay for MO national guard and vets.
- MCCAIN: I remind you it doesn't take a lot of skill to get shot down
- 3Q) How do you feel on stem cell research?
    - MCCAIN: We should fund it. There are now new technology advances called skin cell research, which I hope will make this discussion an academic one. so we wouldnt have to do stem cell research. But at the moment I support stem cell research because of its potential for helping people.

- 4Q) Cost of health care is high, but govt too involved. What can we do to pressure our govt OUT of health care?
    - MCCAIN: 6 months ago, health care wouldve been top issue. but gas prices, etc have taken over. we've seen this movie before, it was called HillaryCare. We're not going to do it again. That's what Obama wants to do. WE need outcome-based care. give every Am family $5k credit, community health centers, GAPs because there are "uninsurables." We need to have state and fed govt establish risk pools. Also wellness and fitness; there's an alarming increase in obesity in youth.

- 5Q) my child was stolen in a fraudulent adoption and we've been fighting corrupt courts to get him back. I hear youre against court corruption and corrupted lobbies, but also that you want to loosen standards on adoption. What are you going to do?
    - MCCAIN: I'd be happy to examine your situation. I'm a STRONG believe in adoption, want to make it very possible for women who face a difficult situation. I will continue my advocacy for the unborn and the born. I'd be happy to see what i can ascertain given the facts of your case.
    - FOLLOWUP: What can you do to help support natural parents' rights in the process of adoption?
    - MCCAIN: I have supported faith-based organizations and making proceedings go as quickly as possible. my record is very clear on my support of adoption because it's vital for those who support the rights of the unborn.

- 6Q) why not drill for oil domestically?
    - MCCAIN: Gridlock in Washington. we need to lift the ban on OCS drilling. And to devleop batteries for cars. I support alternative fuels. jokes "In iowa i used to have a glass of ethanol every morning before breakfast" but i dont think we should subsidize it. BTW i lost iowa. France reprocesses spent nuclear fuel. Why is it Obama opposes that? I call this the Lexington project. there's green technologies out there. It'll be a boon for America's economy. we have to eliminate the gridlock in DC and demand people put their country first.
    - FOLLOWUP: Like health care, trying to figure out a universal solution isnt going to work. So i agree with you.

- 7Q) What will you do for bipartisanship when youre in office?
    - MCCAIN: I have a record of it. Obama has the most extreme record. 1st priority is setting priorites. 2nd is reforming government, restore trust and confidence. we have a broken SS system, broken Medicare. I want to be President to do the hard things.

- 8Q) We need leadership at the top level to address educaiton, drop out rates.
    - MCCAIN: You're right. Yesterday i talked to the NAACP, that wonderful and venerated org, about education. I believe in choice and competition, NCLB was a good beginning that needs to be fixed. I believe in vouchers and charter schools. They're trying to eliminate charter school system in DC that thousands of Afr-American parents are trying to get their kids into. NYC and NOLA are great examples of charter schools. we need to reward good teachers and find bad ones new jobs.

- 9Q) How are we going to make sure we take care of vets when they come home?
    - MCCAIN: Technology allows us to get people from battlefield to care faster. But there are long lines. "This is a tough war," a lot of PTSD will need to be treated.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 10Q) Trying to bring his fiance over from the Phillipines but I can't get her over here.
    - MCCAIN: Majority of our office is vets' and immigration issues. In terms of the overall implications of your question, "this meeting is adjourned." We tried before and failed. We have to secure the borders first and then comprehensive immigration reform. We need tamper-proof biometrics docs. And employers that still hire these people should be prosecuted. And we have to treat people here in a human fashion. And another thing: on Mexican border, there's a tremendous battle between Mexican govt and drug dealers. It's not just an immigration problem, it's a drug problem. Through Amerita, we'll for the first time try to stop the threat of these drug cartels. Drug cartels are sending these things in that kills are kids.

- 11Q) [Young Republicans shirt] It seems like we've come to full-out hatred between liberals and conservatives. How will you restore unity
    - MCCAIN: I worry about that a lot. there is a poison atmosphere politically in the USA. Too often we question people's patriotism because we disagree with them. I respect Obama, and his success and his getting so many people into politics. I will run a respectful campaign. When I go to the floor of the Senate and I vigorously disagree, I don't question their patriotism because I might have to work across the aisle with them and it's inappropriate. And we need it now more than ever. Congress only misses a recess and a pay raise and right now what's going on is not healthy for America because we'll have to work together. I will be the President of all people, and that's how I will convince Americans to stop acting this way.

- This state is important, i'll need you. I'm the underdog. They've counted me out several times, they've buried me. But i'll be back. Thank you and God bless USA.

Below are some food facts to think about...

Fast Food Facts

Did You Know . . .

- Quizno's large classic sub has 3,550 milligrams of sodium? That's equal to 13 single-serving bags of potato chips (KREM.com).
- Papa John's Meat Pizza for One has more calories than six Twinkies (KREM.com)?
- One serving of Panera's New England Clam Chowder has more saturated fat than an entire package of bacon (KREM.com)?
- You're probably underestimating how many calories you eat at Chipotle? Studies show the average customer underestimates calories by 21%, thinking they eat about 630 calories in a burrito when in reality it's closer to 900 calories (Public Health Nutrition).
- One Double Quarter-Pounder with Cheese from McDonald's has over 35% of the average 2000 calories suggested for the average person to consume in a day (thedailymeal.com)?

Sweet Tooth

Did You Know . .

- Reducing your added sugar intake can also reduce your risk of heart disease? In a study of sugar's effects on the heart, participants who consumed more than a fifth of their calories from added sugars doubled their risk of heart disease (WZZM13.com).
- The average U.S. adult consumes about 22 teaspoons of added sugars a day? That's close to four times the recommended total for women and double for men (WZZM13.com).
- Chocolate can decrease your risk of a heart attack? Chocolate contains phytochemicals, which help lower blood pressure, reduce inflammation, and increase HDL (good cholesterol). Dark chocolate is recommended, as it contains more phytochemicals than milk chocolate (medicalxpress.com).
- Chocolate does NOT cause acne? Acne does not appear to be caused by any specific food, but rather by acne-causing bacteria, an excess of skin oil, and a buildup of dead cells within the pores (medicalxpress.com).
- White chocolate is not chocolate at all? It's a confection made from sugar, vanilla, cream, and cocoa butter, but does not contain any chocolate (medicalxpress.com).

Watch What You Eat!

Did You Know . . .

- Eating foods rich in fiber can reduce your blood sugar? It can also help keep you full, enhance regularity, prevent heart disease, and keep your body free from cholesterol or toxic build-up. Whole fruits, vegetables, whole and unprocessed grains, root vegetables, nuts, seeds, beans, and legumes are all rich in fiber (onegreenplanet.org).
- Artificial trans fats are not suitable for human consumption? Producing them involves high pressure, heat, and hydrogen gas in the presence of a metal catalyst. It also drastically increases your risk of heart disease (care2.com).
- Eggs can be among the healthiest foods you can eat? Eggs were unfairly demonized because the yolk is high in cholesterol. Studies have shown that the cholesterol from eggs doesn't raise blood cholesterol in a majority of people. New studies also show eggs have no effect on heart disease on otherwise healthy individuals. The truth is that eggs are rich in nutrients and most of those nutrients are found in the yolk (care2.com).
- Organic and gluten-free foods are not necessarily healthier? You can still make plenty of junk foods out of organic ingredients. And while naturally gluten-free food is fine, processed gluten-free foods are often made with ingredients that are more harmful than their gluten-containing counterparts (care2.com).
- Eating less sodium could help our entire country? Reducing the sodium Americans eat by 1,200 mg per day could save up to $20 billion a year in medical costs (fitness.gov).

National Sleep Awareness Week

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As law students we all know how important sleep is, though it seems like all too often we don't rest nearly as much as we know we should. National Sleep Awareness Week is March 2-8, conveniently running right up to spring break when we can all catch some needed shut-eye and recharge our batteries.
Sleep has all sorts of health benefits, as if you needed another reason to hit the hay!

- Insomnia is a risk factor for a wide variety of health problems, including anxiety, depression, heart attack, rheumatoid arthritis, and osteoporosis (Journal of Sleep Research).
- Sleep can help you eat better! Just one night of no sleep increases cravings for calorie-dense foods, like pizza and donuts, over healthier alternatives (University of California, Berkeley).
- A lack of sleep can lead to depression. A study of people diagnosed with depression or anxiety were more likely to sleep less than six hours a night (Sleep in America).

A lack of sleep has led to many disastrous effects!

- The explosion at the nuclear facility at Chernobyl, widely considered the worst disaster of its kind, was partly caused by engineers that had been working for over 13 hours straight.
- The third mate at the helm of the Exxon-Valdez oil spill was allegedly asleep at the wheel at the time of the crash after having only taken a "catnap" in the previous 16 hours.
- The meltdown at Three Mile Island, the worst nuclear incident on American soil, was attributed to human error on the part of shift workers who were sleep deprived.

So how can you get better at catching some ZZZ's?

- Having consistency in your schedule (consistency with the time you get up in the morning, meal schedules, and bed times) has been shown to lead to better sleep (Journal of Gerontology: Series B).
- Make sure you get good sleep regularly, recovery sleep does not improve brain functioning (American Journal of Physiology-Endocrinology and Metabolism).
- Don’t go to bed hungry, but don’t eat a big meal right before getting into bed. If you want a bedtime snack, keep it bland and light (Harvard Medical).
- If you can’t fall asleep after 15 to 20 minutes, get out of bed and go into another room. Do something relaxing, such as reading quietly with a dim light (Harvard Medical).

Do you struggle with managing your time? Our CAPS counselors recently presented a workshop to discuss strategies for better time management and avoiding procrastination. You can watch the program at http://apps.law.georgetown.edu/webcasts/eventDetail.cfm?eventID=2561.

June 1st Nightly Press Traffic Summary

- The New York Times (Maggie Haberman) is doing an online story for tomorrow about Clinton, Sanders, and O'Malley meeting with the American Federation for Teachers to court their endorsement.
- Newsweek (Emily Cadei) is doing a story on campaigns using Medium that will highlight Brian Fallon and John Podesta's posts that helped push back on the Clinton Cash narrative.
- CNN is releasing a new national poll tomorrow that will show a slight dip in Hillary Clinton's numbers. They are attempting to also fold into the story the Des Moines Register poll from today to make the case that the race is tightening, though the same poll was viewed by other (including NYT) as a sign of Clinton's continued strength.
- San Francisco Chronicle is doing a story on Hillary Clinton indicating that Citizens United will serve as a litmus test for her Supreme Court nominees.
- Washington Post (Roz Helderman) is working on a piece about the Clinton Foundation accepting donations from Qatar. They've spoken to a workers' rights leader who asserted that at the very least, nobody should accept money from Qatar without calling them out for their unacceptable standards for workers. The Foundation is handling most of the pushback, but we highlighted a speech she gave in Qatar where she did offer criticism on this front.
- Maggie Haberman is working on a story about Marc Elias working with Robby Mook on voting rights lawsuits 2 years ago. We are pushing back on the notion that this was a coordinated political effort to help Hillary Clinton, noting that fighting back against voter suppression has long been a priority of both HRC and the Democratic Party at large.
- The New York Post is writing on Hillary Clinton speaking about moving to phase out coal at today's fundraiser
- Business Insider is doing a story about Martin O'Malley attacking Hillary over her lack of a policy plan to rein in Wall St. and the big banks.
- Other stories that are still outstanding include:
    - Jonathan Martin on mobilization vs. persuasion
    - Anne Gearan on Super Saver program
    - Anna Palmer on female donors
    - Ruby Cramer on Robby Mook
    - Olivia Knox on White House/Clinton camp coordination
    - Laura Meckler on domestic policy rollout this summer

Subject:	[big campaign] MMR: McCain/Palin Interview - "disapointed in Paulson", Ridge makes rounds - "questionable associations" reflect poor judgment, Giuliani puts Obama in "Marxist Group", Harwood/Scarborough concede Obama not socialist

Media Monitoring Report:

Highlights:

1. MSNBC: Giuliani - Barack Obama Started the Socialist Conversation With Joe the Plumber
   GIULIANI: 'The campaign didn't raise this. Barack Obama raised it. He's the one who told Joe The Plumber I want to spread the wealth, he's the one who said I'm gonna raise capital gains tax whether it increases revenue or not. He is the one in his book he says that he deliberately wanted to associate with certain groups of people. He mentions belonging to that group, Marxist professors, things like that."
2. MSNBC: John Harwood States Firmly that McCain Supports all Proposals He Deems as Socialism; Scarborough Concedes- It is not Socialism
   HARWOOD: John McCain favors redistribution, okay? He favors a progressive tax system, he favors refundable healthcare tax credits to people who don't pay taxes, which is what he's attacking Barack Obama for, his solution for social security is to take money that's scheduled to go in benefits for rich people and give it to people who make less money...
3. CBS: Tom Ridge touts McCain's moderate appeals in Pennsylvania, Obama's far left policies to redistribute wealth. Supports V.P. choice of Palin and ignores Ted Stevens effect
   TOM RIDGE: And I think, particularly if you take a look at a battleground state like Pennsylvania, they don't drive their political cars in the far left lane. I think that on some of these issues, Senator Obama, as Senator Clinton pointed out is probably even outside the mainstream of his own party. And if you get a President Obama with a Senator Reid, and a Speaker Pelosi, and a vice president who says that your it's your patriotic duty to pay more taxes. I don't think Pennsylvanians think that they're under taxed. I don't think they are prepared to pay more taxes, and they certainly don't want a Supreme Court with activist judges who take upon the responsibility to bring economic justice, with redistributing the wealth.
4. FNC: Ridge uses Rashid Khalidi to question Obama's judgment, philosophy
   TOM RIDGE: It is clear that during his young political career he has associated himself with people out of the mainstream of America thought, mainstream of the Democratic Party, extremists, whether he was dealing with the Minister in Church, the domestic terrorist Ayers, now this revelation. Bottom line it suggests, certainly, questionable judgment. Does it reflect a certain philosophy? Is it part of a philosophy that suggests that you got to have a activist judges, that view redistribution of wealth as a matter of economic justice? It just raises a lot of unanswered questions and that's one of the challenges throughout this entire campaign. We have a very gifted speaker, but untested in any significant way, totally inexperienced. But as we learned as we grew up, questionable associations, you got to be careful who you're hanging around with.
5. CNBC: McCain says he's "disappointed" by Paulson, wants to buy up bad home loans, and uses Biden's comments on national security to warn against untested, unqualified Obama
   JOHN MCCAIN: I've been tested, to start with. Second of all, Senator Biden was right, Senator Biden was correct. If Sarah or I had said that, could you imagine the reaction? Scaring Americans, etc. But Senator Biden had it right, this is an untested individual, who has been wrong on the things he's been tested about. He still refuses to acknowledge that he was wrong on the surge. When Russia committed aggression against Georgia, he asked Georgia to exercise restraint. He said he would sit down with the Castro brothers, Chavez, Ahmadinejad without any preconditions, thereby legitimizing their radical, aggressive, anti-American, anti-peace positions. So I agree with Joe Biden, I couldn't have said it better myself first, but he's right. This is an inexperienced person who so far, has exercised bad judgment about national security.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: The problem though of course, he has a mixed message. He talks about more government programs while he talks about cutting spending. This is a guy that calls Barack Obama a socialist for wanting to let Bush's tax cuts lapse, he opposed Bush's tax cuts-

RUDY GIULIANI: No, no, no he doesn't call him a socialist because he wants to let Bush's tax cuts lapse. –

SCARBOROUGH: The whole campaign is suggesting that-

GIULIANI: The campaign didn't raise this. Barack Obama raised it. He's the one who told Joe The Plumber I want to spread the wealth, he's the one who said I'm gonna raise capital gains tax whether it increases revenue or not. He is the one in his book he says that he deliberately wanted to associate with certain groups of people. He mentions belonging to that group, Marxist professors, things like that.

SCARBOROUGH: There is a lot of fear and loathing going on out there in middle America. I know because I get tons of emails suggesting that the world as we know it will come to an end if Barack Obama is elected President. You're a guy who's worked with Democrats and Republicans. You had to be a Republican Mayor of New York. If Obama wins its not the end of this country as we know it is it? He's not a socialist is he? It's not the worst thing that could possibly happen. …

GIULIANI: It's much more important that we elect John McCain. … No matter who we elect, this country is going to move on. We are a great country, we all have different views and the reality is I think I'm pretty darn right that McCain makes a big difference for this country. … But the reality is the country can sustain anything.

WILLIE GEIST: Now (the Redistribution of wealth issue) just fell into his lap, because of something Barack Obama said, why haven't they been seizing on this earlier? [..]

JOE SCARBOROUGH: [...]They really should have seized on it earlier, [...]the second Obama talked about spreading the wealth, they should have been a lot more aggressive, you've got- what is your theme? And you go with one theme and you hammer it home, especially when you have all of this- the clutter out there, and they haven't done that...

JOHN HARWOOD: It may be though guys,[...]because they knew about this ahead of time but an earlier point in the campaign, when they weren't as needy as they are now, thought it was ridiculous, because it is ridiculous.

SCARBOROUGH: What's ridiculous?

HARWOOD: This whole redistributive change stuff.

SCARBOROUGH: That's ridiculous to you?

HARWOOD: John McCain favors redistribution, okay? He favors a progressive tax system, he favors refundable healthcare tax credits to people who don't pay taxes, which is what he's attacking Barack Obama for, his solution for social security is to take money that's scheduled to go in benefits for rich people and give it to people who make less money...

SCARBOROUGH: Okay, you're talking about John McCain and [...]

HARWOOD: I'm talking about John McCain and what I'm saying is the exact charge that he's making against Barack Obama- that he favors policies that take more from people at the top and give to people at the bottom- he also favors.

SCARBOROUGH: Okay, if you want to go down that path, you can say that John McCain also is one of the only two republicans that voted against this tax, the Bush tax cuts, which he's now championing [...]

HARWOOD: Yes, yes! Which is part of the incoherence problem that you mentioned earlier, saying he was against it and now he's for it.

SCARBOROUGH: But if this is the tack they've decided to take they should have weighed in, and I agree with you completely[...]

HARWOORD: You're right

SCARBOROUGH: But I will tell you, I am personally concerned by any politician that talks about the redistribution of wealth- that the Warren court was not radical enough, I'm concerned when somebody tells a guy that wants to start a small business that he should be for spreading the wealth- these are things that cause concerns, not just conservative- fiscal conservatives [...]

HARWOOD: It's a matter of degree

SCARBOROUGH: [...]McCain, in the end, is just not the man to fight back against this message is he?[...] There would be better fiscal conservatives to carry this message forward, right?

MARK HALPERIN: There's no question. [...] But isn't it the case, that if one of these guys is president for eight years, after eight years, if Barack Obama's president, the government would be substantially bigger, than if John McCain were president for eight years [...]

HARWOOD: I would say bigger, I don't know how substantially bigger. [...]When the candidate who's accusing him of wanting to redistribute, is also proposing the same thing, it sort of sounds like just words.

Tom Ridge touts McCain's moderate appeals in Pennsylvania, Obama's far left policies to redistribute wealth. Supports V.P. choice of Palin and ignores Ted Stevens effect (CBS, 10/27/08, 7:11am)
MAGGIE RODRIGUEZ: Last week you said McCain would be fairing much better in your state had he chosen you as a running mate. Sarah Palin certainly is trying really hard. She's been there eleven times, four more times today. Do you think she's been a drag on the ticket in your state?

GOV. TOM RIDGE: Well first of all, I said that Senator McCain chose a vice presidential candidate not to win one state, but someone who had appeal across the board in all 50 states. It would be like saying, would Senator Obama be doing even better in Pennsylvania if he had Ed Rendell as a running mate, I suspect he would. So, at the end of the day, it's really not about vice presidential candidates it's about presidential candidates, and John McCain's record of reform, his record of bi-partisanship, his willingness to bring fiscal discipline to Washington, and to cut taxes is a message that resonates across Pennsylvania.

RODRIGUEZ: Yesterday Alaska Republican Senator Ted Stevens was convicted on corruption. Do you think that this will at all effect the McCain-Palin race?

RIDGE: Absolutely not. At the end of the day, I think Ed did identify the issue that's going to drive much of the voting patterns throughout Pennsylvania and around the country and that's the economy. And I think, particularly if you take a look at a battleground state like Pennsylvania, they don't drive their political cars in the far left lane. I think that on some of these issues, Senator Obama, as Senator Clinton pointed out is probably even outside the mainstream of his own party. And if you get a President Obama with a Senator Reid, and a Speaker Pelosi, and a vice president who says that your it's your patriotic duty to pay more taxes. I don't think they are prepared to pay more taxes, and they certainly don't want a Supreme Court with activist judges who take upon the responsibility to bring economic justice, with redistributing the wealth. The job is to create wealth. That's what presidents should do, not to share it or redistribute it. And I think John's plan, focusing on the energy sector, giving incentives to small businesses, research and development tax credits, linking all those together to drive us out of this economic mess, as well as leading the world with an experienced man in the world of military and foreign policy, fighting the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the combination of experienced and tested leader is exactly what Pennsylvanians are looking for, and I suspect will vote for come election day.

Ridge uses Rashid Khalidi to question Obama's judgment, philosophy [FNC, Fox and Friends, 10/28/08]
PETER SCHIFF: Who is Rashid Khalidi, and why does he matter?

TOM RIDGE: Well, I know very little about it other than, it's been explained to me, he might have been an ex leader of the PLO, a terrorist organization. What it suggests is a trend here of associations that call in Senator Obama's judgment. I really don't know too much about the individual, other than it's a late story. And again, it's an association with someone of questionable associations and Senator Obama has quite a few of those. It's a trend here that should cause some people some concern.

It's this association with a spokesman of President Bush, when he designated Arafat as a terrorist, and the organization as a terrorist organization, it is clear that during his young political career he has associated himself with people out of the mainstream of America thought, mainstream of the Democratic Party, extremists, whether he was dealing with the Minister in Church, the domestic terrorist Ayers, now this revelation. McCain says he's "disappointed" by Paulson, wants to buy up bad home loans, and uses Biden's comments on national security to warn against untested, unqualified Obama (CNBC, 10/28/08, 9:40am)
MARIA BARTIROMO: We're in a financial crisis, clearly. We're expecting further layoffs and further banks to go belly-up. Why should the American people believe and feel that the two of you have your hands on the wheel and can take us out of this?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well because we have a plan of action to get America's economy going again. Maria, it has to do with a wide range of prescriptions. But one of them is, to keep people in their homes. Look, it was the housing crisis that started this, ok? Fannie and Freddie, it was the catalyst that blew this whole thing up. And frankly, the administration is not doing what I think they should do, and that's going in and buy out these bad mortgages, give people mortgages they can afford, stabilize home values and start them back up again. They did that during the depression, it was called the homeowners loan corporation. We got to keep taxes low. We've got to cut spending. We've got to find alternative fuels, including offshore drilling and nuclear power. And we have to have a positive agenda for job creation. But I'd like to start with keeping people in their homes.

BARTIROMO: So over the short-term, your plan is to keep people in their homes and buy those mortgages. Over the longer term?

MCCAIN: Over the longer term, as happened by the way during the Great Depression, was over time, money came into the treasury. Obviously we have to stabilize our financial institutions. We have to unfreeze credit. How do you do all that? You create jobs in America. And we can do that in a broad variety of ways and one of them is to stop this $700 billion transfer to countries that don't like us very much. Now I know the price of oil is down temporarily and that's reflective of a lot of conditions in the world. But we still have to free ourselves of our dependence on foreign oil. Because over time, it still is a finite resource.

BARTIROMO: Governor Palin, what about that? Now oil is around $60 barrel. Is it still an important issue to become energy-independent? And how do you do it?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SARAH PALIN: Now is the opportunity to seize this and to be able to invest in the domestic solutions that are here now for that offshore drilling that is safe and responsible, for the nuclear we need to tap into, and the alternative sources. Drilling for the sources we know are here and flowing the natural gas in the pipelines that we're building up there in Alaska also. Now is the opportunity that we have and we better seize it. We cannot lull ourselves into this false sense of security, just because the price of a barrel of oil is $64. It's about half of what it had been even when we were speaking last time. But no, now is our opportunity, the domestic solutions that are there, we tap into them, we become less and less beholden on foreign sources of energy, and we circulate these hundreds of billions of dollars a year in our own country, creating jobs for Americans.

MCCAIN: And look who we're depending on? Look at the part of the world we're depending on. Look at Hugo Chavez? It's a matter of national security. And by the way, nuclear power, which I'm a big proponent of, as you know, reduces greenhouse gas emissions dramatically. So it's environmental, it's natural security and it's economic issue. It's not the only answer, but building 45 new nuclear power plants creates 700,000 jobs in America.

BARTIROMO: Speaking of national security, Joe Biden said if Obama is elected, he'll be tested in the first six months. In your view, who is most likely to test him and how would you handle it differently?

MCCAIN: I've been tested, to start with. Second of all, Senator Biden was right, Senator Biden was correct. If Sarah or I had said that, could you imagine the reaction? Scaring Americans, etc. But Senator Biden had it right, this is an untested individual, who has been wrong on the things he's been tested about. He still refuses to acknowledge that he was wrong on the surge. When Russia committed aggression against Georgia, he asked Georgia to exercise restraint. He said he would sit down with the Castro brothers, Chavez, Ahmadinejad without any preconditions, thereby legitimizing their radical, aggressive, anti-American, anti-peace positions. So I agree with Joe Biden, I couldn't have said it better myself first, but he's right. This is an inexperienced person who so far, has exercised bad judgment about national security.

SARAH PALIN: It wasn't just Joe Biden though. It was confirmed by Madeline Albright too, saying of course, he was stating fact, that there would be that testing of someone who is inexperienced, not ready to lead, as Joe Biden had been telling us all along in the primary that Barack Obama is not ready to be Commander in Chief.

BARTIROMO: Do you worry about the attacks, I know I am but that's not the question, but there's been so much mud slinging going on. People want answers and solutions here. There are many issues I'd like to get to. In addition to taxes, unions. Why haven't you made the union issue a campaign issue? That is, the right to have a secret ballot. Why isn't this a major issue on your agenda?

MCCAIN: We've talked about it a lot, and unfortunately there's three or four issues that you can get out strongly. We've been talking about for a long time, this is a threat to the fundamental of labor management relations. It's fundamental to democracy, the right to have a secret ballot. The way that Senator Obama envisions and the unions, and this is their big push, they've gotten commitments from Senator Obama and Senator Biden. A union organizer goes to your house and says, hey, Joe, can I sign you up for the union? That is, we all know what that opens the door to. It's dangerous for America, it's dangerous to small business. And I think it's a threat to one of the fundamentals of democracy.

BARTIROMO: Will you veto the bill?

MCCAIN: In a New York minute, if I may say that. I will do everything in my power to block such legislation. And imagine, Senator Obama and Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid pushing the union agenda, it would be very, very unfortunate.

BARTIROMO: Let me go back to the tax issue. Over the long term, you want to keep taxes low. We're spending $10 billion a month on the war in Iraq. Why not make the American people pay for it?

MCCAIN: Because we study history. History shows that if you practice protectionism, and isolationism and at the same time you raise taxes, you send an economy from a recession into a depression. That's history. The guy's name was Herbert Hoover. And it was aided and abetted later on. This is the worst time to raise anyone's taxes. And obviously, Senator Obama has now, thanks to Joe the Plumber and other research, have authenticated, he wants to redistribute the wealth. He wants to quote spread the wealth around by taking money from one group of Americans and giving it to another. And as you know, that number, level of income goes down and down and down.

MARIA BARTIROMO: Will you ask Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson to stay on, at least temporarily, if you win?

MCCAIN: I think it would depend on the situation at the time. I'm disappointed that Secretary Paulson has not put the first emphasis on buying these home loan mortgages, and keeping people in their homes. So, I admire and respect him, but I certainly would have somebody who would give that our highest priority. As you know, the chairperson of the FDIC has also agreed with that. Get the home values under control, and back up again.

Background Details

- About 100 demonstrators at various locations around Church: mostly pro-McCain; also pro-Paul, pro-Obama; pro-life (pics of dead babies etc) [tracking footage NOT available]
- Very tight security: secret service, local police (including the cavalry division, bike cops and cops on segways), and church security guards.
    - Many guests told their tickets were not good for entrance into the auditorium and instead were diverted to several different tents with screens set up.
    - Visitors with the correct tickets were turned away if they had large purses, cameras or cell phones.
    - The street entrances to the church were blocked off by police, audience members and press parked off site and were shuttled in.
- Only certain networks were allowed into the event. Others, incl. many local affiliates, put in a cafeteria at the church compound with live audio feed and projection of live video feed onto 2 screens.

Speech Highlights

- 1Q) Leadership. Who are the 3 wisest ppl you know you would rely on heavily in an Administration?
    - JM: First would be Petraeus, 1 of the great generals, took us from defeat to victory in Iraq. 4th of July a year ago L. Graham and I in Baghdad. Only someone like DP could motivate someone like that. (2) John Lewis - continues to serve and have optimistic view of USA. can teach us about serving selflessly. (3) Meg Whitman
- 2Q) What's been your greatest moral failure and the greatest moral failure of USA?
    - JM: Mine, and i have been a very imperfect person, is the failure of my 1st marriage. USA's has been thruout our existence perhaps we haven't devoted ourselves to causes greater than our self-interest, although we've been teh best at it in the world. After 9/11, we shouldnt have told ppl to go shopping but to expand our volunteers, expand our great missions in USA and across the world, esp in Rwanda. And a lil pandering here, the 1st lines in your book are this is not about you and that means serve a cause greater than your selfinterest.

- 3Q) An example of where you led against your party's interests and maybe against your own best interests for the good of USA?
    - JM: By strange coincidence, I wasnt elected Miss Congeniality again this year. Climate change, spending, torture, the list goes on where I've put my country first and reached across the aisle. 1 of the times, probably the most trying, when I was first in Congress adn very dedicated to Reagan--he won the cold war without firing a shot--he wanted to send troops to Beirut in a peacekeeping mission and my knowledge and background told me that was bad. as many know, 100 marines gave their lives for that. it was tough to go against my party and be called disloyal.

- 4Q) What's the most significant position you held 10 years ago that you don't hold today?
    - JM: Offshore drilling. we gotta drill now and here. I know that there are some here in Cal-i-fornia that disagree with that position. Could i also mention this is a natl security issue? we're sending $700b to countries that dont like us very much, incl. to terrorists. We cannot allow it. Let me say, too, at the town hall mtgs that i have every day energy is what's on ppls minds every day, so let me take a sec. We have to do everything: wind, solar, hybrid cars, hydrogen cars, and it has to include nuclear. Everyone wants to imitate the French. we now have a pro-American president of french.

- 5Q) Most gut-wrenching decision you ever had to make and what'd you do to make it?
    - JM: Long ago and far away in prison camp in N Vietnam. My father was high-ranking admiral and they offered me early release. Code of conduct said we left in order we arrived adn i had a friend Alvarez that had come before. i was not in good physical condition, but i said no. In full disclosure i didnt know the war was going to last another 3 yrs. not only the toughest decision but also i'm the happiest with that decision as any i've made.

- 6Q) What does being a Christian mean to you? and what does it mean in your everyday life?
    - JM: It means i'm saved and forgiven. And not just the US but the world. The vietnamese kept us in prison 2-3 or solitary confinement. they would sometimes bind us. 1 night a guard came in adn loosened the ropes. 4 hours later tightened them and left. on Xmas we were lined up outside cell and same guard drew a cross in the sand and then rubbed it out and walked a way. for a minute, it was just 2 christians standing there.

- 7Q) 40million abortions since Roe v. Wade. For ppl who believe life begins at conception, thats a holocaust. What point is a baby entitled to human rights?
    - JM: at the moment of conception. i have a 25-year pro-life record, in Cong, Senate and I will be pro-life POTUS with pro-life policies.

- 8Q) Ok, define marriage.
    - JM: Union b/t man and woman, b/t one man and one woman. are we going to get back to SCOTUS or should i here?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- FOLLOWUP: was CA Sup Ct ruling wrong?
- JM: I believe they were wrong. I believe we should preserve unique status of marriage. It doesn't mean they can't enter into legal agreements. If a fed court decided AZ would have to follow same rules as MA, then i'd favor a constitutional amendment. but it's a states decision.

- 9Q) Would you favor fed amendment for embryonic stem cell research given new developmetns in technology?
  - JM: difficult decision for those in pro-life community but i've come down on side of embryonic stem cell rsch, though i think skin cell rsch will make this debate academic.

- 10Q) Does evil exist and should we contain it, ignore it or defeat it?
  - JM: Defeat it. i will follow bin laden to the gates of hell and i know how to get him. central battleground is in iraq. its not just in AQ, its not just in iraq; theyre establishing cells here in USA too.

- 11Q) Whcih existing SCOTUS justices would you NOT have nominated?
  - JM: with all due repsect, Justices Ginsberg, Breyer, Souter and Stevens.
  - WHY?
  - JM: POTUS has enormous responsiblity in picking lifetime appts. Should not legislate from the bench. and btw, Justices Alito and Roberts are 2 fo my most recent faves and i'm proud of Bush for nominating them.

- 12Q) Would you insist that faith-based orgs not discriminate on faith in order to receive federal funding?
  - JM: Absolutely not.

- 13Q) USA 18th in education but 1st in education. 80(?)% of Americans believe in merit pay. I don't want your stump but--
  - JM: Yes yes and find bad teachers another line of work. Choice and compeition (repeats), home schools, charter. I want every American to have same choice as Cindy and I and Obamas had. Charter and home-schools work. Vouchers in DC works. [goes into stump] NYC is reforming, NOLA. We gave everyone chance to go to school but what good does it do to send them to failing school?

- 14Q) On taxing, define the rich. Give me a # on difference b/t middle class and rich.
  - JM: Some of the richest ppl i know are most unhappy. richness should be defined by home, education and ability to give children a better world. i dont want to tax the rich, i dont want class warfare or redistribution of wealth. there are small business ppl working 16 hours / day that some would define as rich. lets give ppl tax credits for health care, let's not have the govt take over. if youre just talking about income, how about $5M? seriously--and i'm sure that comment will be distorted--we want to keep taxes low and increase revenue. spending's been the probelm. we spent $3m of your money studying DNA for bears. we laugh about it but we cry. while youre paying at the pump, theyre on vacation. we should stop them and call them back. we cant raise taxes in tough economic times. i want to give working americans a better shot at having a good life. Americans are hurting: unemployment, foreclosure, education, affordable health care. We need to give Americans hope and confidence in the future. and i can inspire, i can lead.

- 15Q) [not time for this w. obama] Right to privacy vs. national security?
    - JM: we must preserve rt to privacy for all citizens, incl. secret ballot for union members. we've had technological advances over 20-30 yrs letting our enemies have remarkable ability to communicate. through cyberspace, etc, ppl can communicate. so we'll have to step up our ability to monitor. sometimes within USA sometimes not. Congress needs to address it in bipartisan fashion. our inability to work things out was compromising our ability to ward off terrorist attacks.

- 16Q) What's worth risking American lives?
    - JM: freedom. natl security. we must temper that with the ability to affect the outcome. wars have started in obscure places that have later inveloped us. we cant right every wrong but we can be a beacon of hope and liberty for the world. there are conflicts we cant settle. the most precious thing we have is american blood. we have shed our blood for freedom of other countries - no other country in world has done that. we've succeed in other ways. we won the Cold War w/o firing a shot b/c of our ideology. and communism was wrong and evil, and we defeated it jsut as we can defeat islamic extremism.
- FOLLOWUP: What's your criteria for war?
    - JM: American natl security interest.
- FOLLOWUP: What about Darfur? or massive killingi n Georgia?
    - JM: our obligation is to stop what we can. rwanda. we've got to do more to stop genocide in darfur. we should supply logistics and aid ot help the Africans. we have to be committed to never say 'never again' again?

- 17Q) What about Russia's aggressions?
    - im sad to sit here while such terrible things are happening. 118k are being affected in that country. it was 1 of first christian nations in 14th cent. Saaskishvili was educated in US. in georgia they achieved a revolution, achieved prosperity. and now russians are aggressing. we need a ceasefire. they need to respect territorial integrity.
    - it's about energy. russians are using energy as weapon against europeans. we need to send a msg to the russians that this behavior is not acceptable in 21st century.

- 18Q) Religious persecution- what would you do to put pressure on so-called allies, e.g. china, iraq, that dont allow religious frdm?
    - JM: bully pulpit is one of President's greatest assets. Reagan called to take down this wall and he was todl not to. our judeo-christian principles dictate that we do what we can to help ppl aroudn the world. in dark corners of world, lil countries like belarus yearn to be like us. but we remain the most unusual experiment in history adn im proud to be a part of it. i know what it's like without it.

- 19Q) Would you consider something akin to president's emergency plan for AIDS for children who become orphans? assisting families take in these children?
    - JM: i think we need to make adoption more available in USA--thats why so many ppl go abroad for it. My great hero T. Roosevelt was 1st to talk about adoption. [anecdote about cindy adopting Bridget from bangladesh. she's 17 and our life is blessed]

- 20Q) why do you want to be POTUS?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - JM: I want to insipre a generation of americans to serve a cause greater than their self-interest. i think americas best days are ahead of us. but we also face a # of challenges, domestic and foreign -- these past few days have shown us that mroe. i've always put my country first, from military to House of Reps to Senate. America watns hope, optimism, bipartisanship. i ahve record of reaching across the aisle. america thinks its time to sit down together. when i go to gee's bend and meet the Afr-American women there who are lovely and go to other places where they probably won't vote for me, they know that i will be president of every american and i will always put my country first?

- 21Q) What will you say to ppl that question me asking you these questions in a church?
    - JM: I'd like to be in every venue in america. this is an important election. our nation was founded on judeo-chrisitan values. im happy to be in a place where you've done so much good.

- [standing ovation]
- warren brings them both on stage, they shake hands

Speech Highlights
Palin:

Thank you for the warm introduction, being here on a hot day you know no matter what others say I like small town folk like me because they just get it. Hits Obama for comment on clinging to guns and religion, says John McCain will put America first.

[crowd chants USA]

McCain is his own man, he is a Maverick, doesn't run with the herd

The only man in the race that isn't afraid to use the word victory when talking about the two words. I want to hear Barack Obama say he wants America to win. John spent 5 and a half years as a POW – he is the kind of man I want to be the next Commander in Chief - Those of you who have served in the past let us honor you, raise your hands. We thank you for your service and sacrifice – JM is always proud to be an American. Our opponents do always talk about the past, they look to the past because that is where you find blame.

… There is anger about the insider dealing in Washington, anger about the DC elite. John McCain is going to turn your anger into action. In a time of great economic worry, he will help you keep your jobs, go to school and all of us afford healthcare. We are going to fix our economy [Talks about education] parents know how to educate their child. Have government on your side.

We will balance our federal budget in the next ten years. Where we are with the federal government, we have to quite digging the whole we are in. We have to pass a spending freeze for all but the most important, like veterans care.

As a mayor and governor, I eliminated personal property taxes, and small business inventory taxes. Then as governor suspending our state fuel tax. With a surplus in our state, returning it back to the people of Alaska, because it is their money and they know how to spend it better then government.

John McCain proposed a solution important for retired Americans who invest in the stock market. Folks forced to sell at these current lows that is not fair. He has called for the rules to be suspended as soon as possible. That will help our estimed senior citizens
He will help bring stability to our housing market because of predatory lenders. We can fix it with that big bailout that congress past. I know that all the working government from their government is be on our side. We are going to get this economy back on track
You can not afford increased taxes right now, so listen closely to our opponents plans, Obama voted 94 times for increasing taxes, even on people making more then $42,000 a year. He wants to spend a trillion dollars more. America is in deep debt.
America is in debt, and he will get us in deeper…. Its that common sense conservatism that is John McCain, in times like these the last thing we need is another tax increase, America can't afford another big spender in the White House.

John and I also, on a mission to set this country on a path to energy independence. Drill baby drill, you got it [crowd chants Drill baby Drill] You bet, and this one is my baby, your right. What we have to do to get our country to energy independence. We need to build more nuclear power plants. Clean Coal, lets talk coal [crowd chants - mine baby mine] that is new, and we haven't heard that at the rallies, that is good, may I plagiarize that. There is more coal in this country then oil in Saudi Arabia. Why aren't we using it? Joe Biden [crowd boos] he said there is no such thing as clean coal. Rather Biden approves of it or not, JM and I will develop clean coal here in America. Our plan for coal will make more jobs. You know those resouce development jobs are darn good job my husband works in oil in AK. The first dude your right. I know all about those oil productions, energy production jobs, my family is recipients of the benefits of those jobs. Blue color jobs.

Our money is going to other countries that don't necessarily like us, asking them to ramp up production, that is non-sense. We are going to safely drill for the billions of barrels of oil that we have here in America. John and I have talked about another mission he would like me to focus on, one that is near and dear to my heart, to focus on families with special needs. These childrens can inspire a special kind of love, a love more Americans need to get a hold of. These children are not a problem, they are a priority, we need to show them the heart of America. The truest messure of any society is how it treats those who can not speak for itself. Who is more vulnerable then our children. I had to say a lot of pryers, I didn't know what to expect. I had to admit I was scared, we had to ask for strength and understanding. Everyone belongs in the circle of protection. Every child has something to contribute to the world, if we give that child a chance

[crowd chants Sara]

There are the world standards of perfection, what you see in the magazines, and then there are Gods standards. Gods standards are the final measure. Every child is beautiful before god, and dear to him for their own sake. We all stand to learn more from my child then he does from us. We do not feel scared anymore, we feel blessed. I fought for and helped secure additional funds for children with needs. As a VP I will make sure these families have a friend in the Whitehouse.

It is not mean spirited, or being negative to ask to look at my opponents record. Look at my opponents partial birth abortion votes, I am not being negative. I am asking you to look and judge for yourself. We believe in the forward movement of freedom and not the growing expansion of government.

… We still believe that America is that shining city on a hill. I thank god we have a man who is ready to lead it. With heroics and trust worthy deeds and not just words.

The private sector, that is where it is at. Government is not the answer, too often it is the problem. We will put country first. Help me Ohio to help put John McCain in the White House. We know who the bad guys are, the terrorist, and those who would sympathize and support those terrorist who would seek to destroy all the we value. Those are the bad guys. In the economy it is those who have been greedy, and corrupt. We know who the good people are, it is you, we will end the arrogant and selfish practices of DC.

You will hear our opponents say they will fight for you, there is only one man in this race who has every really fought for you. He has the courage to keep on fighting for you. That man is John McCain. Thank you OH.

Thanks,

BuzzFeed: “Full Transcript Of BuzzFeed News’ Interview With President Barack Obama”

[Interview by Ben Smith]

February 11, 2015, 12:13 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] BuzzFeed Editor-in-Chief Ben Smith sat down with President Barack Obama. Twenty-two minutes, eighteen questions.

FULL TRANSCRIPT:

BuzzFeed News: So, eight years ago, today actually, you announced your campaign in Springfield. I read that speech last night and I was struck by how much it’s a generational call to your generation, I guess to some degree mine. You use the word “generation” 13 times in the speech. Now, two of the leading candidates for the next presidential nomination are of the previous generation, and I wonder if you find that at all disappointing?

President Obama: Well, they’re both obviously highly qualified candidates. Hillary Clinton I know much better than I know Jeb Bush, and I think she’d be an outstanding president. My understanding is that everybody else is younger than me, which—

Wasn’t that the idea?

Obama: —I guess matches up with my gray hair. But, you know ultimately what people are going to be looking for in the next president is what they always look for in a president and that is somebody who is attuned to the hopes and dreams of the American people at a particular moment in time. When I ran in 2008, I think what people understood was that the middle class had been left behind for a pretty long stretch of time. We had been involved in very costly wars that didn’t seem to have necessarily made us safer and they were looking for change and, you know, I suspect that the next candidates are going to be grappling with some of the issues that I talked about at the State of the Union: How can we make sure that we have broad-based prosperity now that we're out of crisis? How do we deal with terrorism in a way that's smart and effective? How do we address long-term issues like climate change that sometimes are really hard to do politically? So I think it will be a fascinating debate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You were elected with this new coalition of young people, people of color, women, and I wonder, is that a coalition that the next Democratic nominee — Hillary Clinton or not — inherits?

Obama: I don't think any president inherits a coalition. I think any candidate has to win over people based on what they stand for, what their message is, what their vision is for the future. I think what's true is that I've done very well among younger Americans, and that's always been something I've been very proud of: our ability to reach out to get people involved who traditionally have not always gotten involved or have been skeptical about politics. I think the fact that we got a lot of support from African-Americans or Latinos or Asian-Americans is just reflective of the shifts in the country. I think it's also important to remember that I won Iowa, which doesn't have one of the most diverse populations in the country. I think there's been, you know, talk that there's a need to reach out more to older Americans or middle America or white working-class families that Democrats haven't done as well on, but that hasn't been unique to me, that's been going on for a while.

Do you think that's right, that there is a need to reach out to them more?

Obama: I absolutely do. I think that one of the biggest challenges in our politics is always how do we get all of us to recognize what we have in common. And there's so many forces that push us apart. Race is just one of them. You've got the rural-urban divide. You have states that are traditionally very Republican versus very Democrat. North-South. But one of the great things about being president is you travel around and it turns out everybody's struggling with the same things, everybody's hoping for the same things. People's values are pretty common, and what I said during the State of the Union is something I still believe, which is that we are more unified than our politics would let on, and the question — particularly during presidential elections — is can we get our politics to give voice to those common things?

If I can move on to the Affordable Care Act. We reported yesterday that the office supply store Staples is — I'm sure this is an issue you've heard about before — is telling its workers that it will fire them if they work more than 25 hours a week. A manager had told a worker we talked to that "Obama's responsible for this policy," and they're putting these notices on the wall of their break room saying that. I wonder what you'd say to the CEO of Staples, Ronald Sargent, about that policy?

Obama: What I would say is that millions of people are benefiting from the Affordable Care Act. Satisfaction is high. The typical premium is less than 100 bucks.

But this is a specific consequence…

Obama: No, I'm gonna answer the question. And that there is no reason for an employer who is not currently providing health care to their workers to discourage them from either getting health insurance on the job or being able to avail themselves of the Affordable Care Act. I haven't looked at Staples stock lately or what the compensation of the CEO is, but I suspect that they could well afford to treat their workers favorably and give them some basic financial security, and if they can't, then they should be willing to allow those workers to get the Affordable Care Act without cutting wages. This is the same argument that I've made with respect to something like paid sick leave. We have 43 million Americans who, if they get sick or their child gets sick, are looking at either losing their paycheck or going to the job sick or leaving their child at home sick. It's one thing when you've got a mom-and-pop store who can't afford to provide paid sick leave or health insurance or minimum wage to workers — even though a large percentage of those small businesses do it because they know it's the right thing to do — but when I hear large corporations that make billions of dollars in profits trying to blame our interest in providing health insurance as an excuse for cutting back workers' wages, shame on them.

Moving on to Russia. You started this presidency with a very productive relationship with President Medvedev and the relations are now probably at their worst since the Cold War. How much of that do you ascribe to Vladimir Putin's character?

Obama: You know, I don't want to psychoanalyze Mr. Putin. I will say that he has a foot very much in the Soviet past. That's how he came of age. He ran the KGB. Those were his formative experiences. So I think he looks at problems through this Cold War lens, and, as a consequence, I think he's missed some opportunities for Russia to diversify its economy, to strengthen its relationship with its neighbors, to represent something different than the old Soviet-style aggression. You know, I continue to hold out the prospect of Russia taking a diplomatic offering from what they've done in Ukraine. I think, to their credit, they've been able to compartmentalize and continue to work with us on issues like Iran's nuclear program. But, if you look at what's happened to the Russian economy, even before oil prices collapsed, it is not an economy that's built for the 21st century. Unfortunately, those forces for modernization inside of Russia, I think, have been sidelined. That's bad for Russia and, over time, it's bad for the United States, because if Russia is doing badly, the concern is that they revert to old expansionist ideas that really shouldn't have any application in the 21st century.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We asked our readers [for] questions and we got a lot of questions about weed. One guy, Shawn Gould from Wilmington, it's a familiar situation. He has a felony marijuana possession conviction, so he can't get a job. He said he can't get a job at Boston Market. A kind of problem that disproportionately affects young black men like him. This is obviously a policy challenge you've spent your whole career — one of them — thinking about, but you've been president for six years. What do you say to him?

Obama: We have tried to begin a process of reforming how we deal with nonviolent drug offenses, starting with Eric Holder, our attorney general, providing different criteria for evaluation for U.S. attorneys, suggesting to them they don't always just have to charge the maximum in order for them to do a good job. In fact, sometimes it's more appropriate to look at whether a charge against a nonviolent drug offender is the right charge. We are reaching out to judges and lawyers — both prosecutors and defense bar — to look at how we can begin to more systematically change sentencing when it comes to nonviolent drug offenses. We've revamped the pardoning office in the Justice Department because, traditionally, we weren't reaching a lot of nonviolent offenders who, if they received a pardon, perhaps would be in a better position to get employed. Overall — and the final thing is our office of drug prevention policy, one of the things we're trying to do is move off just an enforcement/incarceration strategy more to a public health, treatment strategy. When you look at the progress we've made in reducing teen smoking, for example, or promoting seatbelt use: It's not because we criminalize things, alone — although in the case of seatbelts, obviously, you can get a ticket — a lot of it just had to do with public education. The same is true on drug abuse. Unfortunately, we've short-changed that side and the consequences have been particularly devastating in certain segments of the community that need to be addressed.

I want to move to the big LGBT news of yesterday, but first we had a very specific question from a reader who worked for you, a federal lawyer who's transgender named Emily Prince. Federal policy bars discrimination against transgender people under health care plans covered under the ACA, but federal worker plans largely don't cover gender reassignment surgery. Should they?

Obama: You know, I haven't looked at that policy. My general view is that transgender persons, just like gays and lesbians, are deserving of equal treatment under the law. And that's a basic principle. As you mentioned, my sense is that the Supreme Court is about to make a shift, one that I welcome, which is to recognize that — having hit a critical mass of states that have recognized same-sex marriage — it doesn't make sense for us to now have this patchwork system and that it's time to recognize that, under the equal protection clause of the United States, same-sex couples should have the same rights as anybody else.

There are a few officials in Alabama, starting with Judge Roy Moore, but also a number of probate judges, who are resisting that. Do you see shades of George Wallace in the schoolhouse door?

Obama: Well, I… look, I won't… I won't say it's a perfect analogy, but there's a core principle here that's at stake, which is we have a supremacy clause in our constitution. When federal law is in conflict with state law, federal law wins out. My understanding — my recollection is that Judge Moore had a similar problem with a federal court ruling that you couldn't put a huge Ten Commandments statue in the middle of your courthouse and, ultimately, federal law was obeyed, and I think that the same thing will end up happening here.

Is there anything you'd say to him?

Obama: You know, I think that the courts at the federal level will have something to say to him.

David Axelrod wrote in his book that you hated and weren't good at, he said, "bullshitting" about your position on marriage in '08. Why did you feel you had to do it?

Obama: Well, you know, I think David is mixing up my personal feelings with my position on the issue. I always felt that same-sex couples should be able to enjoy the same rights, legally, as anybody else, and so it was frustrating to me not to, I think, be able to square that with what were a whole bunch of religious sensitivities out there. So my thinking at the time was that civil unions — which I always supported — was a sufficient way of squaring the circle. That, OK, we won't call it "marriage," we'll call it "civil unions," same-sex couples will have the same rights as anybody else, but the word "marriage" with its religious connotations historically would be preserved for marriages between men and women. Where my evolution took place was not in my attitude toward same-sex couples, it was in understanding the pain and the sense of stigma that was being placed on same-sex couples who are friends of mine, where they'd say, "You know what, if you're not calling it marriage, it doesn't feel like the same thing. Even if you gave me the same rights, the fact that I'm being treated differently or the love that we feel is somehow segmented off, that hurts." It was because of those conversations that I ended up shifting positions, that civil unions, in fact, were not sufficient rather than marriage. But I think the notion that somehow I was always in favor of marriage per se isn't quite accurate. What I was in favor of is making sure that…

Despite that old questionnaire?

Obama: Well, yeah. The old questionnaire, you know, is an example of struggling with what was a real issue at the time, which is how do you make sure that people's rights are enjoyed and these religious sensitivities were taken into account? You know, these are the kinds of things you learn as you… move forward in public life: that sometimes you can't split the difference. That sometimes you just have to be very clear that this is what's right. And what I'm very proud of is to see how rapidly the country has shifted and maybe the small part that I've played, but certainly my Justice Department and others have played, in this administration in getting to where we need to be.

I have sort of an organizing question about that, which is if you talk to people who were involved in your initial coalition — you have labor union activists, civil rights activists, environmentalists, and LGBT rights activists — it's the LGBT rights activists right now who feel most totally fulfilled by your administration, by what you've done. I wonder, did they do something right? Did they push you harder? Or was it just their moment and it really wasn't about what they did?

Obama: Yeah, I, you know, I think it was a matter of… It was an idea whose time had come. I also think that, unlike sometimes issues of race or even in some cases economic status, I think that there are a lot of people, including Supreme Court justices, who have somebody in their family or somebody that they know who's gay and, as more and more people came out of the closet and they said, "Well, gosh, well, I love that person." It changed—

So you don't give the organized community credit as much as the cultural change?

Obama: Well, no no no. I mean, I think the organized community did an excellent job. But, look, the immigrants' rights organizations have done an excellent job, the civil rights organizations have done an excellent job. I think that a lot of it had to do with the willingness of people to recognize the regard they had for the LGBT communities or people in their families. But part of it is also, frankly, that an issue like nondiscrimination for the LGBT community is a little bit easier than the issues of inner-city poverty, right? You not discriminating against a gay person may require you to undergo some change of mind, but it doesn't require you to potentially — calling on the government to provide more support for impoverished children so that they've got day care that's high quality.

We've just got a couple more minutes and there are a couple national security questions I wanted to get in in that time. First, lot of complicated parts in this surveillance debate, but there's one thing you could do with the stroke of the pen, which is ending the bulk collection of metadata. Why haven't you?

Obama: Well, what we've done is called on Congress to create a program that preserves what we need in order to fight against potential terror attacks on the homeland while addressing the concerns of privacy critics and libertarians.

But why not stop the program now?

Obama: Well, because I'm still hopeful that we can actually get a bill passed… You know, there is bipartisan support for the bill, and, as has been true in a lot of instances, including on immigration, my preference is always to actually get legislation passed because it's a little longer lasting.

And finally I wanted to ask you about Kayla Mueller. She was confirmed dead today, and I wondered both if you had any reaction to her murder and, really, how do you tell a family that the United States government is not going to do all it can or we have a policy of not doing all we can in these situations?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama: Well, first of all, my immediate reaction is heartbreak. I've been in touch with Kayla's family. She was an outstanding young woman and a great spirit, and I think that spirit will live on. I think the more people learn about her, the more they appreciate what she stood for and how it stands in contrast with the barbaric organization that held her captive. But I don't think it's accurate then to say that the United States government hasn't done everything that we could. We devoted enormous resources — and always devote enormous resources — to freeing captives or hostages anywhere in the world, and I deployed an entire operation at significant risk to rescue not only her, but the other individuals that had been held, and probably missed them by a day or two precisely because we had that commitment. The one thing that we have held to is a policy of not paying ransoms with an organization like ISIL. And the reason is that once we start doing that, not only are we financing their slaughter of innocent people and strengthening their organization, but we're actually making Americans even greater targets for future kidnappings… You know, it's as tough as anything that I do, having conversation with parents who understandably want — by any means necessary — for their children to be safe, and we will do everything we can, short of providing an incentive for future Americans to be caught.

And I understand the policy review underway, you're ruling out ransoms. Is anything even being considered there?

Obama: Just as a general rule, what we don't want to do is make other American citizens riper targets for the actions of organizations like this.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "This terrible poll shows Elizabeth Warren beating Hillary Clinton"

By Aaron Blake

February 11, 2015, 12:04 p.m. EST

MoveOn.org wants Elizabeth Warren to run for president -- so much so that it has commissioned a poll with the very clear purpose of making Warren's potential candidacy look as good as possible.

Mission accomplished. The just-released poll from YouGov shows Warren ahead of Clinton 31 percent to 24 percent in Iowa and 30-27 in New Hampshire.

How do you get results so far afield of any polling we've seen to date? You say a bunch of positive/liberal-friendly things about Warren before you ask the head-to-head question.

In fairness to MoveOn, the group discloses up-front that this is what's known as an "informed ballot" -- i.e. information is shared about candidates before the head-to-head question is asked. MoveOn emphasizes that no negative information is shared about the other candidates (including Clinton), which is a trick often used in such polling.

What MoveOn doesn't disclose is that the only candidate for whom positive information is shared is Warren. And there is a lot of positive information -- 10 statements, in fact.

A sampling:

· "Elizabeth Warren wants to extend the same low interest rates that the federal government gives big Wall Street banks to college students who receive government loans for their education."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

· "The absolute last thing we should do (to Social Security) is allow the program to begin to be dismantled inch by inch. We should be talking about expanding Social Security benefits -- not cutting them."

· "No one should be above the law. If you steal a hundred bucks on Main Street, you're probably going to jail. If you steal a billion bucks on Wall Street, you darn well better go to jail too."

· "People feel like the system is rigged against them. And here's the painful part: they're right.... Oil companies guzzle down billions in profits. Billionaires pay lower tax rates than their secretaries."

· "Sen. Warren says, 'I came out of a hardworking, middle-class family. I came from an America that created opportunities for people like me, and I now see an America where the government works for people who already have money and power.... We need to remind politicians that they don't work for the big banks -- they work for us.'"

· The takeaway here: If Warren runs for president and is somehow able to run a campaign in which she is the only candidate allowed to share positive information about herself, then she might -- emphasis on might -- have a chance of beating Clinton.

If anything, this poll should discourage Warren from changing her mind and running.

Here's the poll, in case you want to explore:

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Paul: 'I blame' Clinton for ISIS conflict"

By Ben Kamisar

February 11, 2015, 12:30 p.m. EST

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) on Wednesday accused former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton of helping to spur unrest in the Middle East that led to the current battle against militants from the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria.

"One of the people I blame for a lot of this, frankly, is Hillary Clinton," he said on Fox News's "America's Newsroom."

"The disaster that is Libya is now a breeding ground for terrorists and also a breeding ground for armament. I really do blame Hillary Clinton's war in Libya for creating a lot of the chaos that is now spreading throughout the Middle East."

Paul has repeatedly needled Clinton ahead of the two politicians' potential 2016 bids, this time when host Bill Hemmer asked for his take on President Obama's proposed authorization to fight ISIS, sent to Congress Wednesday. The proposal includes vague language that limits the president from "enduring offensive ground combat" but would allow him to authorize limited ground operations and have soldiers target ISIS forces and their associates.

But the plan hasn't been welcomed with open arms on Capitol Hill. Some Democratic lawmakers told The Hill that the language may still be too broad, while Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a statement that he's concerned the president's language isn't broad enough to give "our military commanders the flexibility and authorities they need."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Paul said “the president has to do much more” to combat ISIS, and that America should consider directly arming Kurdish fighters on the ground, he admitted that there has been some improvement.

“They have been pushed back,” he said about ISIS. “I don’t think they are gaining ground."

But he pivoted back to Clinton and said that her push to arm rebels in Syria fighting against President Bashar Assad helped bring weapons into “the hands of ISIS," and criticized her for unrest in Libya.

“I think Hillary’s war in Libya and then Hillary’s admonition, the president’s admonition, and frankly some Republicans' admonition to get involved in the Syrian civil war has actually now created a bigger problem, which is ISIS,” he said.

Washington Post column: Ruth Marcus: “Brian Williams needs to go”

By Ruth Marcus

February 10, 2015, 7:27 p.m. EST

Indecision may not be the best quality in a columnist, but in the case of NBC News anchor Brian Williams, that’s what I find in myself: I doubt that the six-month suspension the network announced Tuesday night is enough, and I think he needs to step down.

My hesitation over asserting that Williams cannot continue in the anchor chair has two components. The first is simple human compassion. Williams seems like a nice guy, with an endearing capacity for poking fun at himself. Those who are enjoying his predicament must be more certain about their own infallibility than I am about mine. Kicking people when they’re up is a lot more sporting than when they’re in a fetal crouch. A six-month suspension is pretty severe.

The second, which gives me far more pause and necessitates the antiquated practice of trial before sentencing, is the essential mystery of memory. We may sincerely believe what did not actually happen.

For years my friend Amanda Bennett told the story of attending the wrong wedding, only to realize her mistake when a bride she didn’t know walked down the aisle. One day Amanda recounted this tale, only to be informed, by the friend to whom the wedding escapade had actually happened , that it wasn’t her story at all. Amanda had somehow appropriated it as her own. It was too good not to retell.

Amanda is smart and tough and an experienced journalist — a former big-city newspaper editor. Her reporting in this instance was sincere but faulty, in the service not of self-promotion but of self-deprecation.

Science supports this possibility. False memories take root. Fragments of experience recombine and emerge as falsehoods — not deliberate lies but untrue nonetheless. This is why the entire context matters so much in Williams’s case: Is his tale of being in a helicopter under fire another example of shifting, faulty memory, or is it part of a pattern of puffery, including Hurricane Katrina? The latter would undercut the likelihood that the helicopter story was a moment of memory gone haywire.

Assume, though, that the evidence tends in the direction of deliberate misstatement. How should we think about the appropriate consequence? Not every journalistic transgression deserves the career equivalent of a death penalty. A single episode of plagiarism, for example, should be judged in the context of an entire career — punished severely but, in certain cases, with a sanction short of dismisssal.

In Williams's case, some thoughtful observers argued that his transgression did not rise to the level of firing (or resignation) because it did not go to the essence of his job — "not a fundamental part of his primary responsibilities," as the New York Times' David Carr put it.

This analysis misperceives the role of news anchor — as NBC itself recognized: "As Managing Editor and Anchor of 'Nightly News,' Brian has a responsibility to be truthful and to uphold the high standards of the news division at all times," Deborah Turness, the president of NBC News, said in a statement.

To the extent that the job is more than merely reading words off a teleprompter, it is to be the institutional voice of trust and reason, reassuring in a crisis, the ultimate reliable narrator. When issues of trustworthiness become a distraction, the anchor loses his credibility, and therefore his perch.

Some discussion of Williams's fate has involved his central role at NBC and whether the network could "afford" to lose its most recognizable franchise. This is the network version of "too big to fail" — that Williams is too important to can. I see it the opposite way: Williams's elevated status subjects him to a higher standard of behavior, and more rigorous consequences. The face of NBC News cannot afford to be so scarred.

Thinking about Williams requires grappling with the consequence of Hillary Clinton's untrue story of coming under sniper fire in Bosnia. If I am correct in concluding that Williams should not continue in the anchor role at NBC, must I then believe that Clinton is unqualified to be president? If I distinguish between the two, is that because of pro-Clinton, pro-Democrat bias? Would I judge more harshly were a Republican candidate involved?

Here, I can only offer my best effort to analyze the two cases objectively. Clinton's sniper-fire statement is, no doubt, a blot on her record. It is not a disqualifying blot. Journalists come to the job with only their credibility to offer. We expect less from politicians in terms of total truth-telling. Spin is part of the business model. You could legitimately decide that Clinton's sniper story is disqualifying, but you must then deal with Ronald Reagan witnessing the liberation of Nazi death camps.

Either way, the untenable nature of Williams's position becomes even clearer. Imagine that Clinton's sniper story becomes a campaign issue. How does Williams, in the anchor chair, comfortably report that news, even after six months away?

Enjoy!

QUESTIONER: [...] You said that heightened security for the Baltic states and Poland might be in order. Can you talk a little bit more about what shape that might take?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, [pauses] when I say that I, I think that we need to make sure that our NATO allies are work closely with us. I think it's important that everyone recognize throughout the world that in the NATO alliance, an attack on one is viewed as an attack on all. But I, I don't think we're gonna reignite the Cold War here with Russia. I think this is a very serious situation. But I don't see this as a return to nuclear standoffs, et cetera et cetera. I want to have a dialogue with the Russians, I want them to get out of Georgian territory as quickly as possible. And I am interested in good relations between the United States and Russia. But in the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations. And we, we will decide in subsequent days as whether degree of provocation and what, who was right and who was wrong. But you cannot justify the extent and the degree of the Russian intervention in Georgia. [...] So my point is that all of us show solidarity together and do whatever we can to make sure that behavior in the 21st century is one of respect for the sovereignty and independence of nations. And that includes the country of Georgia. That's what I meant by that in my response. Yes, sir. Yes, maam.

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights
[McCain Highlights]

- Compares Obama to Hoover: "The last president to do what Senator Obama wants to do- raise taxes and restrict trade in a bad economy was Herbert Hoover. That didn't turn out too well."
    - Continues: They say those who don't learn the lessons of history are doomed to repeat them. Well, my friends, I know my history lessons, and I sure won't make the mistakes Senator Obama will.
- Promises 'Workers who already have health care insurance from their employers will keep it and have more money to cover costs.'
- Says "I know what fear feels like ... what hopelessness feels like ... I felt those things once before. I will never let them in again. I'm an American. And I choose to fight."
- Concedes he's low in the polls but says 'Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.'
- Pep talk feel: litanies of "I have a plan," and "[We have to] fight for"

[Palin Highlights]

- Acknowledges that there's a lot of anger about insider dealing of lobbyists, and greed on Wall Street and about arrogance of washington elite, and anger about voter fraud [crowd cheers].
    - Implores: America, let john mccain turn that anger into action.
- Adds on: "Drill baby drill and mine baby mine "

FULL PREPARED REMARKS

Three weeks from now, you will choose a new President. Choose well. There is much at stake.

[some straight talk:] These are hard times. Our economy is in crisis. Financial markets are collapsing. Credit is drying up. Your savings are in danger. Your retirement is at risk. Jobs are disappearing. The cost of health care, your children's college, gasoline and groceries are rising all the time with no end in sight. While your most important asset -- your home -- is losing value every day.

Americans are fighting in two wars. We face many enemies in this dangerous world, and they are waiting to see if our current troubles will permanently weaken us.

The next President won't have time to get used to the office. He won't have the luxury of studying up on the issues before he acts. He will have to act immediately. [cheers] And to do that, he will need experience, courage, judgment and a bold plan of action to take this country in a new direction. We cannot spend the next four years as we have spent much of the last eight: waiting for our luck to change. The hour is late; our troubles are getting worse; our enemies watch. We have to act immediately. We have to change direction now. We have to fight. [And you and I know how to do that]

I've been fighting for this country since I was seventeen years old, and I have the scars to prove it. If [you elect me] President, I will fight to take America in a new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it.

I'm not going to spend $700 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. I'm going to make sure we take care of the people who were devastated by the excesses of Wall Street and Washington. I'm going to spend a lot of that money to bring relief to you, and I'm not going to wait sixty days to start doing it.

I have a plan to protect the value of your home and get it rising again by buying up bad mortgages and refinancing them so if your neighbor defaults he doesn't bring down the value of your house with him.

I have a plan to let retirees and people nearing retirement keep their money in their retirement accounts longer so they can rebuild their savings.

I have a plan to rebuild the retirement savings of every worker.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them [cheers] to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home.

Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse. Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

The explosion of government spending over the last eight years has put us deeper in debt to foreign countries that don't have our best interests at heart. It weakened the dollar and made everything you buy more expensive.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money, on top of the $700 billion we just gave the Treasury Secretary, as Senator Obama proposes. [crowd boos, chants "Nobama! nobama!] Because he can't [spend that much] without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes. [i'll make them famous, you'll know their names]

If I'm elected President, I won't fine small businesses and families with children, as Senator Obama proposes, to force them into a new huge government run health care program [boos, someone shouts get your ??? out of here!] , while I keep the cost of the fine a secret until I hit you with it. I will bring down the skyrocketing cost of health care with competition and choice to lower your premiums, and make it more available to more Americans. I'll make sure you can keep the same health plan if you change jobs or leave a job to stay home.

I will provide every single American family with a $5000 refundable tax credit to help them purchase insurance. Workers who already have health care insurance from their employers will keep it and have more money to cover costs. Workers who don't have health insurance can use it to find a policy anywhere in this country to meet their basic needs.

If I'm elected President, I won't raise taxes on small businesses, as Senator Obama proposes, and force them to cut jobs. I will keep small business taxes where they are, help them keep their costs low, and let them spend their earnings to create more jobs.

If I'm elected President, I won't make it harder to sell our goods overseas and kill more jobs as Senator Obama proposes. I will open new markets to goods made in America and make sure our trade is free and fair. And I'll make sure we help workers who've lost a job that won't come back find a new one that won't go away.

The last President to raise taxes and restrict trade in a bad economy as Senator Obama proposes was Herbert Hoover. That didn't turn out too well. They say those who don't learn the lessons of history are doomed to repeat them. Well, my friends, I know my history lessons, and I sure won't make the mistakes Senator Obama will.

If I'm elected President, we're going to stop sending $700 billion to countries that don't like us very much. I won't argue to delay drilling for more oil and gas and building new nuclear power plants in America, as Senator Obama does. We will start new drilling now. We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs.

[btw, next time obama says nuclear plants need to be made safe, take him over to one of our nuclear-powered navy ships and ask those men and women.]

Let me give you the state of the race today. We have 22 days to go. We're 6 points down. The national media has written us off. [boos] Senator Obama is measuring the drapes, and planning with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid to raise taxes, increase spending, take away your right to vote by secret ballot in labor elections, and concede defeat in Iraq. [boos] [my friends, i wont concede defeat in iraq, i'll bring them home in victory and honor] But they forgot to let you decide. My friends, we've got them just where we want them.

What America needs in this hour is a fighter; someone who puts all his cards on the table and trusts the judgment of the American people. I come [proudly] from a long line of McCains who believed that to love America is to fight for her. I have fought for you most of my life. There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to do it from the sidelines.

I know you're worried. America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. [crowd chants: Yes! Yes! yes! yes!] But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I know what fear feels like. It's a thief in the night who robs your strength.

I know what hopelessness feels like. It's an enemy who defeats your will.

I felt those things once before. I will never let them in again. I'm an American. And I choose to fight.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country.

Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

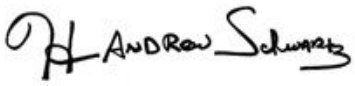
Dear Colleagues,

Today CSIS releases the first episode of an extraordinary 3-part series of video interviews called "Brzezinski On the World " featuring CSIS Counselor and Trustee Zbigniew Brzezinski himself!

Former national security advisor Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski recently sat down with Dr. Jon Alterman, Zbigniew Brzezinski Chair in Global Security and Geostrategy, and research assistant Ben Daus-Haberle for a conversation on the state of the world in the era of global politics and global risks. Drawing on a storied career in public service, Dr. Brzezinski combines his unique historical perspective with fresh insights into the challenges and opportunities facing policymakers in 2015.

"Brzezinski On The World " will be released in three episodes over the next three weeks.



In this first five-minute episode, Dr. Brzezinski analyzes how the United States should think about its relations with Russia and China.

I'm sure you will find it as fascinating, insightful, and timely as I do.

I always welcome your feedback and look for a note from me next week when we release episode 2 of "Brzezinski On The World."

Another presidential legacy gets the Orwellian treatment; Reagan got away with it, George W. will not

The jig has been up for some time now for the once revered Bush administration PR machine with the President's job approval rating failing to crack the fortieth percentile in more than two years. In fact, the President's numbers never really rebounded since 2005 following his hugely unpopular attempt to privatize Social Security; the tragic milestone of 2000 fallen U.S. soldiers hit and surpassed in Iraq; and of course, his administration's woefully inept response to Hurricane Katrina.

That year, Katrina's wake washed away whatever credibility remained following the exposure of this Administration's penchant for payola , staged "town hall meetings," disingenuously named initiatives like "Clear Skies" and "Healthy Forests," fabricated news reports praising the President's prescription drug program, gallingly inappropriate stunts like strutting across an aircraft carrier in a flight suit to declare "Mission Accomplished" in Iraq, and even a phony reporter planted in White House press briefings as a lifeline. Such propaganda tactics would make "The Ministry of Truth" from George Orwell's dystopian classic 1984 blush.

And now the same folks that brought us the needless $3 trillion war in Iraq have the mother of all swan songs left in store: redefining the Bush legacy as something other than a failure. Weekly Standard senior writer and GOP insider Stephen Hayes let slip earlier this month that an unofficial White House PR campaign is afoot - which Hayes dubbed the "Bush Legacy project" -- with the mission of highlighting what they believe are the President's accomplishments and shirking responsibility for the more numerous and far more consequential failures.

For instance, during the first in a series of scheduled media "exit interviews" with the President, ABC's Charlie Gibson asked Bush if he could have a "do-over," what it would be. In true "mistakes were made" form, Bush shrugged off any personal responsibility, replying: "[T]he biggest regret of all the presidency has to have been the intelligence failure in Iraq. A lot of people put their reputations on the line and said, you know, the weapons of mass destruction, is a reason to remove Saddam Hussein. It wasn't just people in my administration."

In reality, more than a few people formerly in his administration have come forward as witnesses to a serious failure of leadership, not intelligence, including former counterterrorism chief Richard Clarke and former CIA national intelligence officer Paul Pillar. Collectively, they tell a tale of a White House that cherry-picked questionable intelligence supporting the claim that Iraq harbored weapons of mass destruction and blatantly ignored intelligence that contradicted it. A White House that pressured Clarke and others to find any way to link the 9-11 attacks to Saddam Hussein. A White House that outed an undercover CIA operative in retribution for her husband going public about dubious claims Bush made about Iraq pursuing nuclear material in Africa.

Their accounts perhaps provide some explanation why Bush, when asked why he rarely mentioned Osama bin Laden anymore during a March 2002 press briefing, -- just six months after the attacks of 9-11 - replied: "I don't know where he is. I'll repeat what I said. I truly am not that concerned about him." By that time, the mastermind behind the most deadly attack ever on American soil who shamefully remains at large today on Bush's watch had already become an afterthought in the most costly bait and switch scheme in our nation's history.

No further proof is needed that the White House PR team is a shell of its former self with their decision to allow the always loveable, reassuring face of Vice-President Dick Cheney back on the airwaves again, despite the recent CNN poll that found 1 and 5 Americans think he is the worst VP ever . Darth Buckshot is still up to his old Jedi mind tricks, confidently looking the American people straight in the eye and insisting that waterboarding isn't torture and that the unimaginable human and financial toll of the war in Iraq was well worth it. Not stopping there, during an interview with ABC News , Cheney said he adamantly disagreed with Karl Rove's recent statements that if the intelligence concluded that Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction, the nation probably would not have gone to war. And when asked on Fox News Sunday this weekend what he thought was the "highest moment the last eight years," Cheney didn't skip a beat: "Well, I think that the most important, the most compelling, was 9/11 itself, and what that entailed." 9/11, his proudest moment? Clearly Dick didn't get the memo.

According to the Los Angeles Times , the White House recently felt the need to distribute a memo to Cabinet members and other high-ranking officials with vague talking points on what Bush accomplished the last 8 years, just in case they find themselves at a loss of words during their final round of public speeches. The memo reportedly includes such talking points as "responded with bold measures to prevent an economic meltdown;" "kept the American people safe;" and maintained "the honor and the dignity of his office."

No word yet whether the highlight reel will include the President's assault on labor or the 6 million fewer Americans that have health insurance since he took office; or the nearly 2 million lost jobs and the more than 2.5 million homes have that been foreclosed on so far this year; or the national debt nearly doubling to over $10 trillion thanks to repeated irresponsible tax cuts for millionaires in a time of war.

No word yet whether the talking points on the unnecessary and mismanaged war in Iraq will note the over 4,200 dead Americans soldiers and over 30,000 more wounded; or how we are less safe as a result after yanking critical military resources from the central front on terror in Afghanistan.

We can expect some self congratulation on the President's education program, but not for the millions of children left behind thanks to its underfunded mandate. No word yet whether the systematic effort to manipulate climate change science and mislead policymakers and the public about the dangers of global warming will make the list. Or how about all the sweeping deregulations written by and for their biggest supporters from the big drug, financial, insurance and oil companies that delivered record profits for each industry at our expense?

And what of the deep recession the nation has struggled through for the last year? The White House memo reportedly proclaims that Bush "responded with bold measures to prevent an economic meltdown." Indeed, another "Mission Accomplished." The millions of Americans who have lost their jobs and homes this year or saw their retirement evaporate on Wall Street apparently owe the President a debt of gratitude.

The White House will no doubt keep attempts at white washing recent presidential history relatively quiet for now. Because, really, how would it look for the sitting President to be focusing his remaining days in office repairing his legacy rather than on the enormous problems left in its wake, like the half a million more jobs that disappeared last month?

But while the administration's subtle efforts at an extreme legacy makeover may seem laughable today considering Bush's painfully obvious culpability for the nation's woes -- that doesn't mean those efforts should be left unchecked at any level. Just ask the Reagan administration.

In 1987, President Reagan's job approval rating plummeted to 42 percent during the height of the Iran-Contra scandal. However, in the remaining months of his presidency, Reagan went largely unchecked and managed to leave office with a 63 percent approval rating -- allowing his conservative disciples to redefine his presidency as an example of successful conservative governance. A remarkable feat, to be sure, for a legacy of unhinged deficit spending, draconian cuts in federal assistance to local governments, a homelessness boom, and a refusal to acknowledge the fledgling AIDS epidemic. Reagan got away with repairing his legacy on the way out the door; George W. cannot be allowed to do the same.

Fearing a repeat of history, Americans United for Change launched a preemptive strike in January 2008 with a multi-million dollar "Bush Legacy Project" of our own with the goal of cementing into history how 8 years of failed Bush-conservative polices have ruined our economy, threatened our national security and sacrificed so many key domestic priorities. The effort included a national television ad aired around Bush's final State of the Union address and culminated with a 5 month long national Bush Legacy Bus Tour , a 45 foot, 23 ton museum on wheels featuring interactive exhibits on Bush's worst policy failures. The Bush Legacy Bus traveled 24,000 miles, visited 42 states, and was visited by tens of thousands of Americans while parked in front of the local constituent offices of Bush's conservative enablers in Congress.

The Bush legacy should be remembered as a grand and failed experiment of what happens when conservatives are in complete control of the government. Conservative ideology rails against government, argues that government is the problem, not the solution. So when a government run by conservatives is faced with the most important responsibility any government has - to protect its citizens - is it any wonder you wind up with a tragedy of epic proportions like Katrina?

For helping drive a stake in the heart of conservative governance for years to come, Bush actually deserves all the credit and thanks in the world.

Agree. I like it, especially the "twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories". I suspect we might be able to get repeat use of out of that one.

All,

As you are all aware, Jo Becker from the NYT's investigative unit is one of several reporters at work on stories based on material provided by the publisher of the upcoming Clinton Cash book. Jo's story is scheduled to run in as soon as one week.

Separately, this afternoon, Amy Chozick from the NYT called us to indicate she had obtained a copy of the book on her own and intends to file a separate story tomorrow. Her story will not unpack all of the book's claims -- she will leave that to Jo. Instead, she will do a more process-y story about the book's existence, the fact that the publisher has approached multiple media outlets in advance of the book's publication to spoon-feed them some of the book's research, and also remark on the fact that Rand Paul continues to drop hints about the book's contents such that it appears they may be some coordination with individual Republican campaigns.

We think this story, though it was not originated by us, could end up being somewhat helpful in casting the book's author as having a conservative agenda. Moreover, we think Amy is suspicious of the arrangements that the book's publisher has reached with the various media outlets (including her own paper). In fact, Jo Becker is apparently trying to get this story killed because she thinks it will undermine her investigative piece later this month. But so far it is running in tomorrow's paper.

Amy is seeking a response from us on what our approach is to the looming publication of the book and the apparently well coordinated rollout. We have drafted the below response, and wanted you all to see it and provide feedback before we sent it off. Please note, however, that in order to get the statement into the story, we probably need to provide it by about 8:30 tonight. So apologies for the tight turnaround, but here it is:

> "We always expected that while Hillary Clinton was focused on how to help everyday Americans get ahead, the Republicans would focus their efforts on attacks rather than ideas. It appears that this book is being used to aid this coordinated attack strategy, twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories. It will not be the first work of partisan-fueled fiction about the Clintons' record, and we know it will not be the last."

Subject:	RE: Clinton Foundation News & Guidance: Donor Update

Hi all - we wanted to update you on news surrounding today's donor release and encourage you to share on your social media channels.

Perry Yeatman, a Clinton Foundation donor and Clinton Global Initiative member, posted an op-ed about why she supports the Clinton Foundation and the value she sees in CGI.

> "The heart of CGI is smart people, with good intentions, committed to partnering in new ways in order to accomplish valuable and life-saving work for those in need - humans, animals and the planet. Why not simply applaud both the work that's being done and the fact that it's even possible in the first place?"
> "Sensational headlines may get attention but I'm less interested in headlines than trendlines - many of which are now moving in the right direction. I would ask that if we really want to scrutinize something, we scrutinize all the life-changing work CGI has done and it's all too rare ability to bring people together to make the world a better place. Why? Because we need even more of that, not less."

The Hill wrote about new CGI commitments and members and how, compared to the same period last year, donations have increased during the first three quarters of this year.

> "[CGI] Commitments include 'efforts to employ 40,000 health workers around the globe; rebuild schools and infrastructure after the Nepal earthquake; major corporations joining to improve their parental support policies; and professional training for garment workers worldwide.'"
> "First-time CGI members include Apple, Cardinal Health, GlaxoSmith Kline, Xerox and Zurich Insurance, the source said."
> "Instead of these controversies driving donors away, more people sent checks to the foundation during the first three quarters of 2015 than they did over the same period last year."

The Washington Post also wrote about how donations to the Clinton Foundation are up over last year, and the high level of transparency of the Foundation.

> "According to the foundation, donations are up — both measured in dollars given and in number of contributions to the charity, which runs health, environmental and education programs around the world. A spokesman said there were also more sponsors this year of the foundation's annual multi-day Clinton Global Initiative in New York in September, countering reports that corporate supporters had backed off because of a newly politicized atmosphere around the gathering."
> "While it is not required to disclose its donors by law, the Clinton Foundation has done so annually since 2008, when it agreed to publish donor names as part of an agreement with the White House when Hillary Clinton was nominated to become secretary of state. The charity announced in the spring that it would disclose donors more frequently, updating the list once a quarter, part of new measures taken when Hillary Clinton launched her presidential campaign."

In case you missed it, this afternoon Donna Shalala posted a retrospective of the Foundation's work this past quarter on the Clinton Foundation blog:

> "Compared to this time last year, donations are up—both in terms of the amount donated and the number of donors. And, as was the case in previous years, about 90 percent of donations were in the amount of $100 or less."

"But whether it's $5 or $5,000, every single donation matters, and collectively they are enabling us to help more people in more places live their best life story."

Subject: Clinton Foundation News & Guidance: Donor Update

Today, the Clinton Foundation updated its donor posting with contributors who gave in the third quarter of 2015, which included CGI's Annual Meeting. We wanted to make sure you were aware and had information about today's news. We were pleased with the results this quarter, because:

- Total amount donated to the Clinton Foundation in the first three quarters of 2015 is higher than the same period in 2014.
- The number of donors is higher compared to the first three quarters of 2014.
- Consistent with previous years and the first two quarters of 2015, approximately 90 percent of donations were $100 or less.
- CGI sponsorship revenue rose in 2015, with 33 new and returning sponsors. These include Procter & Gamble, The Coca-Cola Co., Microsoft, Goldman Sachs, Cisco, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the Ford Foundation, Gap Inc., NRG Energy, Swiss Reinsurance Co., the Rockefeller Foundation and Western Union.
- Membership in CGI is strong, with 16 of the 30 companies in the Dow Jones industrial average part of CGI. First-time CGI members this year included Apple, Cardinal Health, Xerox and Zurich Insurance.

Donna Shalala posted a retrospective of the Foundation's work this past quarter on the Clinton Foundation blog:

"The Clinton Foundation has a strong commitment to transparency and accountability. In fact, we take measures that make us one of the most transparent nonprofits in the world—including disclosing all of our donors on a quarterly basis. We released the latest update just today."

"Compared to this time last year, donations are up—both in terms of the amount donated and the number of donors. And, as was the case in previous years, about 90 percent of donations were in the amount of $100 or less."

Last month, Bob Harrison, the CEO of the Clinton Global Initiative, wrote an op-ed about how support for CGI has strengthened:

"Despite our mission, some have characterized the turnover of a handful of CGI's sponsors as 'trouble' for CGI and 'abandoning' the Clintons, but this is just another example of critics trying to politicize philanthropy, and the facts don't bear out the argument."

"At CGI, corporations not only provide funding, but also apply their expertise in management, technology, manufacturing, distribution and research to help non-governmental organizations and foundations be more effective. These corporate commitments are providing better access to education and healthcare in the developing world, creating jobs and improving infrastructure in the U.S, and protecting the environment."

And yesterday, the Chronicle of Philanthropy reported on the Foundation's hiring of Kevin Thurm as the new Chief Operating Officer:

"Kevin Thurm will serve as executive vice president and chief operating officer, Ms. Shalala said in a message to foundation staff. He will focus on strategy, day-to-day operations, and the Clinton Foundation's administrative units. He will report directly to Ms. Shalala."

"'Kevin has been a trusted colleague and partner since he served as my chief of staff and then deputy secretary for HHS in the '90s, where he oversaw major policy and management issues, including the implementation of legislative initiatives like the Government Performance and Results Act and challenges like the 'Y2K' computer programming situation,' Ms. Shalala said, referring to the fear in 1999 of a breakdown in important communications when computers switched to 2000."

The support to the Clinton Foundation has enabled specific programs to expand their work and reach even more individuals across the globe. Over the past three months, we have seen many examples of this work in the news:

An Associated Press article looked at Commitments to Action that came out of CGI's Annual Meeting, profiled the unique commitment model. The piece cites several commitments, including:

> "One such pledge has led to financial education for more than 1.2 million poor women and youths and scholarships for more than 10,000 students in Kenya. Another has spawned more than 430 successful online crowdfunding campaigns for projects centered on women and girls. A third, aimed at enlisting African-American churches in combatting HIV and AIDS, has trained more than 500 religious leaders."
> "We're in the middle of defining the terms of our interdependence in a world where so much of our identity is caught up in our differences," Bill Clinton said. "So our job, as citizens — those of us who have no political power — is to do what we can to build up the positive forces of our interdependence and reduce the negative ones."

In September, the Atlantic wrote about the importance of closing the word gap not only to resolve education consequences, but also to improve health outcomes saying, "Children with more words do better in school. Adults who were good students and earned a college degree have longer life expectancies." The article sites Too Small to Fail's "Talking is Teaching" campaign as one of the organizations focusing on this issue.

> "There are certainly people watching, from state health officers in California and Indiana to academics at the University of Kansas. And the Clinton Foundation has launched 'Talking is Teaching' through its early childhood Too Small to Fail campaign."

At the beginning of September, Reuters published an article about climate change's effects on island nations and how the Clinton Climate Initiative's Islands Energy Program is helping to develop sustainable, renewable energy solutions.

> "Dymphna van der Lans, CEO of the Clinton Climate Initiative (CCI), which is working with around a dozen Caribbean and East African island nations to develop and roll out renewable energy strategies, said there was both a moral and economic imperative for such states to transition away from costly diesel imports."

In August, Refinery29 posted a story about the Clinton Foundation's recent trip to Haiti, where they got a firsthand look at our work there and what we're doing to empower girls and women.

> "I think there is such a case for optimism about Haiti," Chelsea says. "And also really about what women can do when we're truly unfettered." These female entrepreneurs strive for success not because it will bring them wealth or fame, but because with steady employment, they're able to economically support not just their families but also other women as well.

Telegraph (U.K.): "Hillary Clinton, interview: 'Forgiveness is hard'"

By Chrissy Iley

July 20, 2014, 8:00 a.m. EDT

It has been said many times that Hillary Clinton's lack of warmth and empathy cost her the 2008 Democratic candidacy. A friend of mine who is a respected editor told me that she finds her smug and cold.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before our meeting, I watched her appearance on BBC One's magazine programme The One Show, a televisual happening that was described as "Einstein doing Play School". I'd go one step further: it was Einstein loving every second of being on Play School. Everything Clinton was asked she responded to with charm, apparent sincerity and, most surprising of all, firecracker wit.

When asked if she prefers the dress sense of Dolly Parton or Angela Merkel she replied: "Dolly for night time, Angela for day." And when asked who was her favourite president, Bill Clinton or Barack Obama, she said that she was glad to have served Obama, who had taken the US out of the worst recession since the Great Depression and introduced universal health care, and glad to be married to Bill who rebooted the economy and created 23 million jobs.

When Rylan Clark, the television presenter most famous for crying hysterically on The X Factor, referred to her on ITV as "babe", she beamed. She can take anything in her stride. But strength doesn't mean froideur in her case. When she arrives for our meeting in a suite at Claridge's, there's none of the pushy, sullen security that's been described in the press and on Twitter.

She enters with her aide, smiling. She is wearing black trousers and a white jacket patterned with tiny black and yellow flowers, pointed flats. She is curious: why is [the Telegraph magazine] Seven called Seven? Why have I flown in from LA? It's as if she's trying to feel her way around me, make a connection. She admires my necklace, a gold chain with charms, and while you could think this was a politician's ploy to get me on side, she's wearing a more dainty version of the same necklace herself, so it seems genuine. She has huge eyes; blue, round, inquiring.

She's here, of course, to promote her memoir, Hard Choices, in which she chronicles her exhilarating and gruelling life as Secretary of State, the world's number-one diplomat, visiting 112 countries in four years. A life of tough decisions and minimal sleep.

She tackled it with gusto and seems to have derived great satisfaction from the job. David Miliband, when he was Foreign Secretary, said, and I paraphrase, that you could have a laugh with Hillary.

Does she really think it's important to trade jokes when the agenda is so serious? "Oh, Chrissy, it's so important, I mean really. National security is serious and dangerous. If you don't have time to be a human being and let your hair down, have a joke, you can lose perspective on what you are doing. And so I have had fun with David, and others."

"Fun" is not the first adjective most people would attach to Hillary Clinton and there is not much "fun" in her memoir. The most moving part of the book is when she talks about her mother, Dorothy Rodham, who had a cruel, abusive and neglected upbringing. Dorothy, who died in 2011, was rejected by her own parents and sent from Chicago to California when she was eight to live with strict disciplinarian grandparents who showed her no love.

Dorothy went out trick or treating one Hallowe'en without permission and as punishment was confined to her room for an entire year. Yet she took solace in the comfort of strangers and any small acts of decency. She became a lifelong campaigner for social justice, as well as a caring wife and mother. How did Dorothy influence the person Hillary became?

"When I was a very little girl, all I knew was that she was my mother. As I got older, probably into my teen years, I could reflect. She was devoted and she was fun. She was an active, involved person in our church and in our school. When I learnt about the terrible set of issues and challenges she faced as a child, my admiration for her grew. I didn't know how she did it; how she came from what she experienced to be what I experienced. It was extraordinary."

What stayed with Clinton was a respect for those who got up after being knocked down. No matter how rejected, betrayed or mistreated you feel, you don't become a whiner. Dorothy never did. If you are a victim, you never move on.

Much has been made of the fact that Monica Lewinsky's visit to London briefly coincided with Clinton's. In a recent Vanity Fair article, Lewinsky described herself as "arguably the most humiliated woman in the world". That is taking the victim role by storm. One could argue that in that particular three-way it was Hillary Clinton who was the most humiliated. The man she loved and stood by cheated on her and it all played out in public.

How did she take that humiliation and turn it around so dramatically? "I moved on," she says simply.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Judging from her Vanity Fair interview, Lewinsky hasn't moved on. Does she feel a little sorry for her?

"I think she is someone who has to express her own feelings. I can't characterise her, that wouldn't be right. I'm just grateful that I made the choices I made, to move forward and from that I've had an extraordinary set of opportunities and experiences." In her book she also talks about the necessity for forgiveness. Did she find it easy?

"No, no," she says emphatically. "Forgiveness is a hard choice. It's liberating to be able to reach the point in your life where you feel you can forgive. Everybody feels they have been trespassed upon and nearly everybody has trespassed on somebody else, maybe not intentionally."

Did the Lewinsky scandal make her and Bill stronger as a couple? "I feel that we always had a close relationship. It doesn't mean that we haven't disappointed each other or fallen short in some way because, of course, we each have in everyday life. There are things that you do or fail to do. I feel very blessed to have a partner in life who supports me, who is enthusiastic about what I want to do, who has been a great father and who will be a fabulous grandfather."

Throughout the interview there is direct and indirect clucking about the advent of her first grandchild; Chelsea is to give birth in the autumn. But I don't think for a minute that her new role as a grandmother – however longed for – would interfere with any decision to run for the presidency. Hard Choices is full of vivid descriptions of dramatic events – the killing of Osama bin Laden being the most dramatic of all – that leave the reader in no doubt that Clinton loved the adrenalin of her job at the heart of government.

Was it hard to keep the bin Laden operation secret from Bill?

"It was hard in two ways," she says. "Hard because I had to keep it from everybody. I had to do the work, the analysis and the recommending based on my own efforts, and I had to keep it from my husband because of the admonition we couldn't tell anybody. I'd have loved to have talked it over with him because I value his advice and experience, but I didn't. And when President Obama called him and the other living presidents about what had happened, he said to Bill, 'I assume Hillary has told you.' He said, 'No, she hasn't told me anything.' I laughed about it with him later and he said, 'Well good, people will know you can keep a secret.' "

Did Bill keep (non-sexual) secrets from her when he was in office? "Yes, he did. I don't think very many, but there are some things that you are expected to keep secret. Even though in our cases we could add value in thinking through these decisions together, we didn't."

How does she think the dynamic of their relationship has changed since she stepped out of his shadow and became a powerful figure in her own right and his public profile has declined?

"I don't think he will ever be anything but a public person, especially in our country. He has his work with the [Clinton] Foundation, his special envoy work with the UN, some of the work that President Obama has asked him to do, and he has an enormously high profile. So I view it as a conversation we started many years ago in law school [both went to Yale], where we each tried to support and really listen to each other.

"When I was Secretary of State, there were many things we could talk over, and we did. We view ourselves as being very much partners in our marriage."

I interviewed Bill Clinton once, briefly, and found him to be hugely charismatic. What's he like around the house? Is he electric all the time?

She guffaws. "I know that when I see it! No, he is very much an around-the-house husband; let's clean up the kitchen, let's take the dogs for a walk, what are we going to do with our garden? Very matter-of-fact, everyday issues."

Was she aware that, thanks to her image as a strong woman, she has become something of a gay icon?

"Really?' she purrs. "That is so touching to hear that. I have a chapter called 'Unfinished Business' about women's rights and gay rights. To me you cannot be fully human, fully civilised, unless you recognise humanity in everyone. Our country has made a lot of progress in issues of racism and sexism and homophobia, but many places around the world are dangerous for women and dangerous for gays, and we have to keep working."

As a feminist, Clinton is unswerving. On Twitter, she describes herself as “wife, mom, lawyer, women and kids advocate, US senator, Sec. State, author, dog owner, hair icon, pantsuit aficionado, glass ceiling cracker, TBD”. She says she was thinking of naming her book “The Scrunchie Chronicles” because of all the attention paid to her hair.

Did she feel, being a woman in power, she had to modify the way she dressed?

“When I was younger and women first started to get in public positions, in my case the law, we went through a period where we wore those little ribbon ties, little bows. We tried to figure out what was our appropriate dress. Now you can be aware of conventions but not be a slave to them. I wear pants of various kinds because it solves a lot of problems. Different jackets, heels of different heights, but I also like to wear something that is more fun, more happy, not be so predictable.”

Her coat today is a happy coat. If it were a cocktail, it would be a margarita.

“Yes, thank you. I happen to love margaritas and it was my mother’s favourite drink. It’s a happy drink.” Nevertheless, her clothes in the past have been criticised. Combined with all the other criticism that has come her way, particularly the on-going furore surrounding her handling of the 2012 assault on the US consulate in Benghazi, in which the US ambassador died, it has, she says, forced her to develop the skin of a rhinoceros. Is there any criticism that still hurts?

“I feel like I’ve run the gauntlet. When somebody is saying something about another person that is unfair, it’s not that it’s about me so much as the meanness that can be displayed towards people. I don’t like that. It used to bother me and I would get frustrated and then I didn’t have the energy for it any more. And I also thought, ‘If I’m spending energy worrying about what somebody is saying about me, then how am I ever going to make the point I want to make?’

"So now I wear my hair how I want it. I’ll wear my glasses if I want to. Women should not be entrapped by those expectations. This book is to encourage young women, in particular, to find their style, their identity and their voice.”

I wonder if she is referring to what has been dubbed “the Beyoncé voters” – single women who have been categorised as a new demographic of potential voters who Clinton will need if she decides to run for president.

“I think what you have to do is make the case that Congress has an enormous impact on matters that are important to you. If you are worried about your student loan, saving for a house, worried about the conditions in the workplace, it’s not just the president you elect, it’s who you elect to Congress. Single women have not been a target for that kind of message.”

Much has been made of the fact that she would be quite an old president (she would be 69). She has also had a health scare – a blood clot that caused her to collapse in 2012. Today, however, she appears healthy and full of brio. Does she have a fitness regime other than the yoga I’ve read about? “Clearing closets makes my head fitter,” she says. “I love a project that has a beginning, middle and end.” She feels liberated from the throwing away of old clothes. “I love the letting go,” she says, laughing.

What will she do if she decides not to run?

“Work in the foundation that Bill and I started and that my daughter is also a member of, the three of us together. I’m going to keep fighting for women’s full participation, their equality and opportunity in every society. I have more than enough to do, it’s just a question of making these hard choices of where I want to put my energy and emphasis.”

Does Bill want her to run?

“He wants me to do whatever I decide to do.”

Having seen the job first-hand, what is the best and worst thing about being president? “The best thing is you can help people solve their problems and manage difficult situations. The worst thing is it's a never-ending daunting set of responsibilities that 24/7 is not enough time to deal with."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She described her campaign for the Democratic candidacy as physically and emotionally exhausting, which is surely nothing compared to the stress of being the actual president. Hasn't she noticed how quickly and dramatically they age?

"Yes. Just look at them, they go in young and vigorous and go grey." Does that worry her? "No, because I can colour my hair!"

She caused brouhaha by announcing how, when they left the White House at the end of the Clinton presidency, they were completely broke. Yet she makes vast amounts from public speaking and book deals and, together, they are estimated to be worth around $55 million. Can she remember what it was like to really be poor?

"Absolutely, yes. Bill and I started off scraping our way through law school. We each had to work several jobs to get through and each had student loans to pay off."

When they got married, there was no money for a proper wedding reception. They had a do at home and she wore an off-the-peg dress she bought the day before. What does she like spending her money on these days? "Experiences. Going to the theatre. Going on vacations to new places."

What keeps her awake at night, apart from jet lag? "I sleep very well, but I do worry about violence from extremists, rogue states that have nuclear weapons. We all worry about that."

Towards the end of the book, when she talks about her mother's death, she quotes Inayat Khan, founder of the Sufi order: "I have loved and been loved."

"I love that quote," she says. "I think it describes any long-term relationship because clearly sometimes you are in greater need than your partner and sometimes it is reversed." She doesn't think that women love doing the loving?

"That's not been my experience. I think there are different phases in men's and women's lives. I know a lot of men who are now retired who are much more loving now than when they were working 16-hour days." Who could she possibly have in mind, I wonder?

For the first time in our interview, the possible future leader of the Free World, is not in the mood for jokes. Finally, there is that flash of steel everybody talks about.

Tickets for this event are sold out.

Clinton will also be one of the speakers at the annual Starkey Hearing Foundation Gala Sunday evening.

"Hard Choices" reached the top of the New York Times' bestseller list for hardcover nonfiction.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "The GOP's 2016 Hillary paradox"

By Alexandra Jaffe

July 20, 2014, 10:30 a.m. EDT

The GOP can't live with Hillary Clinton running for president, but they can't live without her either.

Most Republicans see the former secretary of State as a formidable challenger, albeit a flawed one. Her sheer presence does perhaps more to excite the GOP base than any other Democratic Party figure alive today, aside from President Obama.

It's the Clinton paradox: The candidate they're most worried about beating is also the candidate they may most want to run against in 2016 to both draw out their voters and open up donors' pocketbooks.

"If Hillary Clinton runs, she brings a such a questionable record with plenty of old and new baggage that her candidacy will likely light up Republicans' intensity to keep her out of the White House. Everything from strong Republican fundraising numbers and tremendous grassroots support will be aided by a Clinton candidacy," said Ron Bonjean, a GOP strategist and former congressional leadership staffer.

From Sens. Marco Rubio (Fla.) to Ted Cruz (Texas) to, most recently, Ron Johnson (Wis.), Republican presidential prospects have knocked her as eminently beatable to rev up their own base

But that boast is more than just bluster — it's an assertion that's based in the facts of the past few months as she stumbled through her book tour rollout and revealed she still has many of the same flaws that tanked her unsuccessful bid in 2008.

Over the past two months, Clinton has often come across as stiff or combative in media interviews, especially over the fallout from the 2012 terrorist attacks on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya.

Never comfortable with the press and skeptical of journalists, she's made repeated gaffes on the issue of her wealth that have contributed to the perception of her as out-of-touch, one of Republicans' favorite volleys against her in advance of 2016.

Matt Beynon, an adviser to former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, who's considering a 2016 bid, noted she may not deserve the reputation she has as a gifted politician.

"President Clinton was probably the best politician of his generation and far too much of his aura is automatically transferred to her," he said, noting that she's lost the only truly tough high-profile race she faced, against President Obama in 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her husband has indeed defended her on the wealth issue, but Hogan Gidley, a longtime adviser to former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Santorum, both of whom are considering 2016 bids, said that may have made it even worse.

“She doesn’t have the same credibility with blue-collar workers that Bill Clinton does, because Bill Clinton lived it. Bill Clinton grew up poor. She’d have trouble making that case against someone like a Mike Huckabee, like a Rick Santorum, who have lived it, who can speak to middle-class, blue-collar workers,” he said.

That lack of credibility could undermine her ability to engage in what’s expected to be the key debate of the next presidential election: How to improve the economy and help the middle class succeed.

And on the likely second and third issues — health care and foreign policy — she would arrive on the stage with considerable baggage as well, having led the failed 1994 health care reform effort and presided over a largely unremarkable period as secretary of State.

Indeed, Beynon also knocked her “less than stellar record as Secretary of State, where opportunities to make a major impact in Iran, Syria, Libya and a half dozen other hot spots were spoiled,” and her tenure as a senator from New York was “devoid of any major legislative accomplishment.”

His critiques are old ones, because Republicans already have much of the Clinton playbook written — in part by President Obama’s team. But they’re no less potent than they were in 2008, and Republicans have the next two years to build a narrative around her before Election Day.

While that record offers the GOP a trove of comments and policy issues to mine for attacks, it’s also one that uniquely fires up the GOP base.

The other potential Democratic presidential contenders have flaws, but none have the ties to such hot-button issues among the GOP grassroots as the attacks on the consulate at Benghazi, the 1994 health care reform effort and Bill Clinton’s impeachment as Clinton.

In order to remain competitive on the national stage, Republicans need to turn their base out. Clinton could be the rare Democrat that creates enthusiasm among the bases of both parties.

“There’s no one that quite excites the Democratic base like Bill and Hillary Clinton — but there’s no one that quite excites the Republican base like the Clintons, either,” Gidley said.

Republicans also say she’s a fundraising draw like no other Democrat, both within the grassroots and big-dollar donors. Tim Miller, executive director at GOP opposition research shop America Rising, said while the group doesn’t do a significant amount of small-dollar fundraising, “to the extent that we do, Hillary is by far the biggest draw.”

“I think there is lots of passion on our side in trying to stop Hillary, looking forward to a 2016 campaign, and I think certainly she is going to inspire a high level of intensity from our members,” he said.

That’s true for bigger donors too, Miller noted: “All across the board, nobody likes her.”

The fundraising draw is twofold: Donors contributing because of a concern over what a Clinton presidency would mean for the nation, but also because she is seen as so formidable, and her political machine is expected to be so strong.

Other potential rivals who are seen as less of a threat to the seemingly inevitable Clinton may be less convincing for donors to open up their pocketbooks for 2016.

Democrats laugh off the GOP's apparent quandary, saying they're just running scared of their own highly fluid and somewhat controversial field of possible candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“One thing is obvious, Republicans don't want to run against Hillary Clinton. That's why they are running a full campaign, now, to stop her from entering the race," said Adrienne Elrod of American Bridge's "Correct the Record," a group already established to defend the former first lady from GOP attacks.

"Republicans know she will win. You don't expend that kind of money, capital and time unless you are scared. Republicans are well aware that her forward thinking vision for the middle class and the record of accomplishment she has built can't be stopped," she continued.

Sen. John McCain’s (R-Ariz.) top 2008 campaign advisor Charlie Black, however, cautioned Republicans to “be careful what you wish for” with a Clinton nomination.

‘She will be extremely organized and well-funded — a lot of the Obama team that defeated her and defeated us twice will be working for her. She’s not a charismatic politician, but I think she’s basically solid. The appeal of having a woman president is significant,” he said.

But Black admitted that narrative has played out before, prior to Clinton’s implosion last time.

“If you asked us a year out, we said we’d rather run against Obama than Clinton,” he said of Team McCain, “but we didn’t realize how his charisma and his story would catch on, and we didn’t realize she would turn out to be somewhat of a plodder as a candidate.”

Could it happen again?

“I’m not saying it couldn’t,” said Black. “But I don’t think we ought to pull for her to be the candidate.”

New York Daily News: “James Carville mocks anti-Clinton book”

By Joel Siegel

July 20, 2013, 10:43 a.m. EDT

Former Clinton strategist James Carville mocked the new Bill and Hillary-bashing book "Blood Feud," saying "a Bugs Bunny comic book has more reality to it."

"It's not only me that feels that way," Carville said in an interview broadcast Sunday on 970 AM The Answer.

Blood Feud's author, Edward Klein, "is a man who is not taken seriously by literally anyone. Not even the right wing," Carville said.

Carville, the Democratic strategist who made his name helping Bill Clinton win the White House in 1992, suggested listeners "just spend about 90 seconds on their computers and just Google Ed Klein."

"This guy claims Bill Clinton raped Hillary Clinton .. and that is how Chelsea is born," Carville said, dredging up a claim in Klein's 2005 book, The Truth About Hillary. "It's just insane stuff!"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If any of your listeners want to waste their time and money (buying the book), go ahead," Carville added.

Carville was interviewed by John Catsimatides, the billionaire who unsuccessfully ran for New York City mayor in 2013 and now hosts an hour-long radio interview show every Sunday morning.

Asked by Catsimatides whether he thought Hillary Clinton would make another try for the White House, Carville said, "I think she's gonna run. No one has told me, let me be clear. (But) usually when somene runs for President once, they do it again."

He dismissed suggestions that Clinton could face a serious challenge from the liberal wing of the Democratic Party.

"You look at Democrats across the board, they are very happy with Hillary," said Carville, now a paid analyst for Fox News. "Certainly the Democratic voter is very happy and content for her to be our party's nominee."

New York Times column: Maureen Dowd: "A Popular President"

By Maureen Dowd

July 19, 2014

The thing about him is, he just keeps going.

At 67, he continues to be, as Anna Quindlen once wrote, like one of those inflatable toys with sand weighting the bottom — you knock him over and he pops back up.

As Hillary stumbles and President Obama slumps, Bill Clinton keeps getting more popular.

The women, the cheesy behavior, the fund-raising excesses, the self-pity, the adolescent narcissism, the impeachment, the charges of racially tinged insults against Obama in 2008, the foundation dishabille — all that percussive drama has faded to a mellow saxophone riff for many Americans.

A recent Wall Street Journal/NBC News/Annenberg center poll showed that Clinton was, by a long shot, the most admired president of the last quarter-century. A new YouGov poll finds that among the last eight elected presidents, Clinton is regarded as the most intelligent and W. the least.

(Clinton and W. both should have been more aggressive in catching Osama. But certainly, if Clinton had been president post-9/11, there would have been no phony invasion of Iraq, and Katrina would have elicited more empathy.)

A Washington Post/ABC News poll in May found Bill's approval ratings rebounding to the highest they had been since early in his presidency.

Even some who used to mock his lip-biting have decided that warmth, even if it's fake at times, beats real chilliness.

Speaking at the 92nd Street Y last month, Bill O'Reilly was asked by Geraldo Rivera whether the country would have been better off electing Hillary instead of Barack Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“With Hillary you get Bill,” O’Reilly replied. “And Bill knows what’s going on. You may not like him but he knows what’s going on. Hillary doesn’t understand how the world works.”

Except for L.B.J. and Nixon, ex-presidents tend to grow more popular. Yet Bill Clinton, wandering the global stage as a former president who may return to the White House as the husband of a president, plays a unique role in American history. (Newly released Clinton library documents revealed that Bill, believing it punchier, preferred to use “America” and “Americans” in speeches rather than “the United States” and “people of the United States.”)

But why is he burning brighter now, when the spotlight should be on his successor and his wife?

Do we miss the days when the National Debt Clock was retired? Are we more accepting that politicians have feet of clay? Are we tired of leaders who act as burdened as Sisyphus? Do we miss having a showman and a show?

“Maybe they admire his vegan body,” said David Axelrod impishly, before replying seriously: “He’s the most seductive character that we’ve seen in American politics in our lifetime. He just has this unbelievably resilient and seductive personality.”

James Carville noted dryly: “People are confused. They don’t know which one they like more, the peace or the prosperity.” He calls Clinton the “anti-Putin,” someone who did not exercise power to harm people but to help them.

42 had greater strengths and greater weaknesses than the average pol.

Rand Paul accused Clinton of “predatory” behavior. Liz Cheney told Politico’s Mike Allen that she trusts Hillary more than she trusts Bill, implying that was because of Monica Lewinsky. And Todd “legitimate rape” Akin defended himself on Fox News this past week by hitting Clinton’s “long history of sexual abuse and indecency.”

But G.O.P. pollster Kellyanne Conway said the words “Monica” and “liberal” rarely come up when she polls about Bill Clinton. The words “global” and “philanthropic” come up. She said that after Clinton, people “shrugged their shoulders at what had once made them raise their eyebrows.”

“He was a good ambassador for the baby boomer generation,” she said. “Who hasn’t screwed up? Who hasn’t had a third and fourth chance?”

Perhaps, given the tribal wars in Washington and dark tides loose in the world, there’s a longing for Bill’s better angels: the Happy Warrior desire to get up every day and go at it, no matter how difficult; the unfailing belief that in the future things will be better; the zest in the hand-to-hand combat of politics and policy, the reaching out to Newt Gingrich and other Republicans — even through government shutdowns and impeachment — and later teaming up with Bush Senior. “There’s a suspicion among a lot of people that Obama doesn’t much care for politics,” Carville said. “It’s amazing that a man can be so successful at something he really doesn’t like. It’s like if you found out that Peyton Manning didn’t like to play football.”

Mike Murphy, the Republican strategist, said that Obama’s fade has been “the best Clinton rehab.”

Murphy noted the irony that first, Bill had to use his extroverted personality, his talent as Explainer in Chief and his “empathy ray gun” to help Obama get re-elected, and now he will need to use those skills to push another clinical, cerebral candidate — his wife — up the hill.

“The one guy he can’t help elect is himself because of that pesky Constitution,” Murphy said. “But of course, that’s what he’d love to do.”

Politico: "What we learned from liberals at Netroots Nation"

By Katie Glueck

July 20, 2014, 6:58 a.m. EDT

DETROIT — At a high-profile gathering of progressives this week, Hillary Clinton was tolerated, Barack Obama was pitied, and Elizabeth Warren was treated like a hero.

The annual liberal confab known as Netroots Nation brought together around 3,000 activists converged for several days of campaign training, a protest or two, and speeches from Warren, Vice President Joe Biden and other Democrats.

And while the 2014 election is just months away, many in this crowd were far more focused on the 2016 race for president, a contest they hope will allow for a showdown between the pro-business and populist strains of the Democratic Party.

Here are six takeaways from the gathering in the Motor City:

Warren will be a factor, even if she's not on the ticket.

Elizabeth Warren stole the show this week with her tough messages to Wall Street and Republicans. The Massachusetts senator insists she's not running in 2016, but the conference made clear that progressives will hold midterm and presidential candidates to the populist standard she has set.

A case in point: the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, an activist group that touts itself as being from the "Warren wing of the Democratic Party," is seeking to organize in New Hampshire and Iowa,"to make sure every presidential candidate is asked whether they agree with Warren on key economic populist issues like expanding Social Security benefits, taking on Wall Street, and eliminating student loan debt," spokeswoman Laura Friedenbach said.

Activists here nearly all called Warren a "fighter" — a label she embraced in her speech Friday — and signaled they want other Democrats to get aggressive with banks, corporations and lobbyists to tackle income inequality. Warren has charged that the economic system is "rigged" in favor of the rich and powerful.

Candidates hoping to harness this crowd's enthusiasm will need to embrace that pugnacious stance toward big business, not just talk about creating more opportunities for the middle class. Attendees here see Wall Street as a deeply damaging force in American politics and they want the kind of retribution Warren promises.

There is hope for Hillary Clinton …

Netroots attendees hail from the most liberal corners of the Democratic Party. To them Clinton is simply too conservative on fiscal and foreign policy matters. They see the former New York senator as tight with Wall Street, and she doesn't strike them as willing to fight for working people the way Warren does.

Yet interviews with several attendees suggest it's not a lost cause for Clinton. If she distances herself from big business, highlights her support for labor — a point that came up several times here, given the big union representation at the conference — and demonstrates she cares about the struggles of ordinary Americans, she could go a long way with this group. What it really comes down to, activists say, is a shift in what Clinton emphasizes.

"She would have to have Elizabeth Warren's message," said Cindy Pettibone, an activist from the Washington, D.C., area. "Against big banks and corporations, for the little guy, restoring the middle class and unions."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, who is touring the country to promote her new memoir about her time as secretary of state, appears to have already started adjusting for this. She told PBS's Charlie Rose this week that, if she runs, it would be on a "very specific campaign that talks about the changes you want to make in order to tackle growth, which is the handmaiden of inequality."

Of course, if Clinton goes too far in embracing Warren's tough-on-Wall Street message, it could hurt her fundraising and dampen her appeal among conservative Democrats.

Another hopeful sign for the likely 2016 Democratic candidate: At a party Friday night hosted by Ready for Hillary — the grassroots-focused organization urging her to run — some people showed up wearing "Elizabeth Warren for President" stickers, to sip drinks, snack on pizza and listen to some Motown music.

… but there is plenty of space for a 2016 candidate from the left.

Even though grassroots activists acknowledge that Clinton is the most electable Democrat on the radar right now, they don't want a Clinton coronation.

And if Warren doesn't run, they are hoping another left-leaning candidate will challenge Clinton so that the party will have to engage in a full-throated debate about where it stands on economic issues. They also believe that regardless of whether other candidates are viable, a contested primary would push Clinton to the left.

Potential alternatives some cited include Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a self-described socialist. There's also Vice President Joe Biden, whose keynote speech Thursday was well-received. Though some activists said they don't view Biden much to the left of Clinton, they love that he pushed (if only inadvertently) President Barack Obama to endorse gay marriage in 2012. And they perceive him as slightly less hawkish than the president.

As one national Democrat with close ties to the grassroots put it, activists are "venting" while they can, even if they ultimately rally behind Clinton.

"No one, especially Democrats, no one likes a frontrunner" — at least not at this stage, this person said.

National Democrats' midterms messaging is on point with the base.

Party leaders have been pushing messages about economic fairness as they look ahead to what will drive midterm turnout — and with this crowd, at least, it's resonating.

Issues such as raising the minimum wage, ensuring "equal pay" for women and, more broadly, reducing income inequality all played well here.

In an interview, Mary Burke, who is running for governor against Scott Walker in Wisconsin, also pointed to reproductive and voting rights as issues that could drive Democrats to the polls in an off-year. Perhaps the biggest applause line in Warren's speech came when she melded anti-Wall Street talk with blasting the Supreme Court's recent decision on the Hobby Lobby case, which will allow some private companies to opt out of covering birth control.

Foreign policy isn't much of a factor.

Netroots Nation started in 2006 and has deep roots in the anti-war movement: the conference rose to prominence as progressives grew increasingly angry about the war in Iraq. The gathering this year comes amid renewed chaos in Iraq, the downed airliner over the Ukraine that killed nearly 300 people and an Israeli ground invasion of the Gaza Strip.

But you'd hardly know that foreign policy issues were dominating national and international news. Many attendees are certainly deeply anti-war; they want to see reduced military spending and are concerned about Clinton's record of backing a more assertive foreign policy (some also questioned in interviews whether she would be, in their view, too pro-Israel should she run for president). And a handful of panels addressed national security issues.

But in interviews and in speeches, the topic of international affairs rarely came up. Polls indicate that Americans are increasingly looking inward on foreign policy. The low-key reaction to major global events suggests that attitude also applies to the progressive base.

They're not mad at Obama, just disappointed.

The president has had a tumultuous relationship with the Netroots crowd.

They loved him during his nomination fight ahead of the 2008 election, but many of these activists have grown disillusioned at seeing the White House fail to produce much of the change they felt they'd been promised.

Nonetheless, many said Obama has done what he could given the gridlock in Washington. "He's doing all right, he could be doing better," summed up Antonio Leonard, 26. "But with this Congress, you can't get anything done."

Pettibone, the activist from Washington, added, "If we don't get Democrats out and get a better Democratic Congress in Obama's last two years, he won't be able to accomplish anything."

Politico: "Dean recounts time on the trail"

By Katie Glueck

July 19, 2014, 2:33 p.m. EDT

DETROIT — About ten years after badly losing the 2004 Democratic presidential primary, Howard Dean on Saturday offered a rollicking reflection on his time in politics.

Speaking at Netroots Nation, the annual progressive gathering, Dean — also a former governor of Vermont and chair of the Democratic National Committe — regaled a friendly audience with stories from his time on the trail. Here's a sampling of his most eyebrow-raising lines:

• "The biggest problem was me, of course, because I was saying what I thought."

• Ahead of the Iraq war, former Vice President Dick "Cheney was trying to make out they had an atomic weapons program, which turned out to be complete horse*."

• On getting back into the presidential ring: "Once you've done this, to get back in you definitely need a long period of psychotherapy… When I first got in, I had no idea how mean everybody was going to be."

• "I think Jesus was a left-wing Democrat, if not a progressive."

But he also dealt with weightier topics, including the 2016 Democratic field. He predicted that there will be a primary "no matter what," including if Hillary Clinton — the presumptive Democratic frontrunner — decides to run. Many in the crowd here are hoping that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), who is famous for her populist, anti-Wall Street positions, will also compete, though she has said she's ruled that out.

"I don't think she's going to get in unless Hillary doesn't run," he said. "In which case I know you're going to do everything you can to make sure she goes in, whether she likes it or not."

The room applauded.

Washington Post: "Clinton, despite stratospheric poll numbers, is very likely to face primary opposition"

By Chris Cillizza

July 20, 2014, 10:23 a.m. EDT

With every passing week, one thing becomes ever clearer: Hillary Rodham Clinton is going to be the Democratic presidential nominee in 2016.

This past week's evidence came in the form of two polls — conducted by NBC and Marist College — of Democratic voters in Iowa and New Hampshire. In Iowa, Clinton led Vice President Biden 70 percent to 20 percent. In New Hampshire, Clinton led Biden by 74 percent to 18 percent. (That's not to pick on Biden; he was the strongest of Clinton's possible challengers.)

Despite those stratospheric numbers, it's a near-certainty that Clinton will face some sort — or sorts — of primary opposition. Which begs the question: Why?

To answer that, it's important to remember that not everyone runs for president to win. Some run to promote a cause or a set of beliefs. Others run because timing dictates that they have to. Still others run in hopes of improving their chances of winding up on the ticket alongside Clinton or with a prominent spot in her administration.

When it comes to 2016, the largest group of potential challengers to Clinton come from the "cause" category. Socialist Sen. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) seems intent on running, largely to push his belief in the need for serious campaign finance reform. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley is term-limited, with his second term ending in January, and undoubtedly thinks a credible run for president might bolster his chances of a spot in a Clinton administration. Former Montana governor Brian Schweitzer just seems to want to be back in the political game.

Below are my rankings of the 2016 field. Remember that if Clinton runs, she wins.

Tier 1 (The Clinton wing.)

Clinton: Still think she hasn't made up her mind about running? Check out what Clinton told Charlie Rose in an interview this week: "We have to make a campaign about what we would do. You have to run a very specific campaign that talks about the changes you want to make in order to tackle growth, which is the handmaiden of inequality."

Tier 2 (If she doesn't run, these are the front-runners.)

Biden: The vice president badly wants to run. Just look at his travel schedule, which this week included a keynote address at Netroots Nation, an annual gathering of liberal online activists. And his allies insist that his decision on the race has nothing to do with what Clinton decides. But Biden didn't get this far in politics by being dumb; a race against Clinton is damn close to unwinnable for him — and he knows it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley: The Maryland governor is getting some nice press in early primary states. And he is working those states like no one else in the Democratic field. Because O'Malley can't really afford to wait four (or eight) years to run, I expect him to be in the race no matter what Clinton does.

Elizabeth Warren: The senator from Massachusetts is the only person who could credibly mount a challenge to Clinton. But she's not going to do it. Although Warren is on the record saying she will serve out her six-year Senate term, which expires in 2018, I am hard-pressed to see how she would forgo a run if Clinton took a pass.

Tier 3 (Maybe running. But not winning.)

Howard Dean: Dean has the presidential bug. In 2004, he looked as if he was going to be the Democratic presidential nominee — until people started voting. In 2013, Dean predicted that Clinton would have a primary opponent, and he may see himself as that person.

Sanders: Of everyone not named Clinton (or O'Malley) on this list, the senator from Vermont is doing the most to get ready for a presidential bid. No one — including Sanders — thinks he will win, but his liberal positions could make things uncomfortable for Clinton.

Schweitzer: The former Montana governor proved in a recent interview with National Journal's Marin Cogan that he isn't yet ready for prime time, making impolitic comments about Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.). Schweitzer apologized, but the damage was done. He effectively doused any momentum he had built for a presidential bid.

Tier 4 (The four-or-eight-more-years crowd.)

Andrew Cuomo: The New York governor has a presidential bid in him, but it's not going to be in 2016. If anything, he has moved farther away from a bid rather than closer to one. In 2020, Cuomo will be 62 — right in the sweet spot when it comes to presidential bids. In 2024, he will be 68, the age Clinton will be in 2016.

Kirsten Gillibrand: Like Cuomo, Gillibrand is an ambitious New Yorker who almost certainly will run for president at some point. At 47, she has plenty of time to wait and, as she has done over the past few years, use her perch in the Senate to build her liberal résumé for an eventual national bid.

Deval Patrick: Patrick raised some eyebrows a few months back when he had this to say about Clinton's coronation as the Democratic nominee: "She's an enormously capable candidate and leader. But I do worry about the inevitability thing, because I think it's off-putting to the average . . . voter." It seems very unlikely that the Massachusetts governor will take the plunge against Clinton, but his résumé in the Bay State could make for an intriguing profile in four or even eight years.

Washington Free Beacon: "Riley: Paul, Obama Have Similar 'Disengagement' Foreign Policies"

By Washington Free Beacon

Wall Street Journal editorial board member Jason Riley said Sen. Rand Paul (R., Ky.) and President Obama had similar foreign policies of disengagement Sunday on Meet the Press.

Riley was part of a panel discussing MSNBC host Chuck Todd's report on NBC/Marist poll numbers from Iowa and New Hampshire showing, among other revelations, Paul polling closely with 2016 Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton.

"It is striking, particularly his views on foreign policy [which] I think don't sit well with a lot of Republicans, so I'm a little surprised," Riley said. "Rand Paul's views on foreign policy are not all that different from President Obama's in terms of disengagement. He doesn't like it put that way, but that's the reality there."

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas
Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.
One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.
She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.
As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.
Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.
In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.
Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

Dear Jake,

Attached is my speech at AIPAC yesterday to the Rabbinical Assembly, the organization of Conservative American Rabbis, on rising anti-Semitism in Europe; the Iran nuclear negotiations; and U.S.-Israel relations.

I would like to suggest for Secretary Clinton that on the most sensitive issue, Iran, she be generally supportive of an agreement along the lines I outlined, but, crucially, she indicate (a) grave concerns that Iran's missile program is unconstrained and has no civilian purpose, and that we should make its restraint a priority; (b) that Congress should pass additional sanctions after an agreement that could be imposed by a future President following the 10-15 year expiration period of the agreement, if Iran seeks a "breakout" at that point. In other words, one major flaw in the emerging agreement is that Iran would be free of constraints after the period. She should take the position that unless Iran radically changes its posture over this period of time, the U.S. should never allow Iran to become a nuclear weapons state, as North Korea is now.

This position would be supportive of the Obama Administration's efforts, but would signal a tougher position on what a post-agreement world should look like.

> Whether Mrs. Clinton's approach will be enough to satisfy the unease over growing economic disparity is unclear. In a Gallup poll conducted last month, 67 percent of Americans said they were dissatisfied with the way income and wealth are distributed in the United States. In the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, Mrs. Clinton's economic message — summed up by a frequent refrain, "If you work hard, you play by the rules, you ought to be able to get ahead" — resonated with white, working-class voters, who overwhelmingly supported her over Barack Obama.

But in the years since, Mrs. Clinton has come under criticism for delivering speeches to Wall Street banks at more than $200,000 each, roughly four times the median annual household income in the United States, and for comments she made about her family's financial situation, including a lament about being "dead broke" after leaving the White House. And she must convince a middle class that feels frustrated and left behind that she understands its struggles, even as she relies heavily on the financial industry and corporate interests to fund her candidacy.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said she had "a record of bringing people together to solve big problems, while also putting a real premium on accountability."

Asked whether creating an economic message could affect the timeline for her presidential campaign, Mr. Merrill said, "There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake: If she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges."

Mrs. Clinton's economic plan would be more populist and reliant on the government than the centrist approach of trade agreements, welfare reform and deficit reduction associated with her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

"It's not enough to address upward mobility without addressing inequality," said Lawrence H. Summers, a Treasury secretary in the Clinton administration who is among those talking with Mrs. Clinton. "The challenge, though, is to address inequality without embracing a politics of envy."

The debate is extending beyond the Democratic Party as Republicans wade into the issues. "If Americans are working harder than ever, earning less than they once did, our government and our leaders should step up, offer a plan, fix what's wrong," former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida said in a speech in Detroit last week as he laid the groundwork for his potential 2016 candidacy.

Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state when some major economic debates took hold on Capitol Hill, and as a result, her economic views are still not broadly known. Her approach to poverty was forged in the 1970s, when she went door to door while working for the Children's Defense Fund, leaving her a committed advocate for early childhood education, equal pay for women and paid leave.

But later experiences complicated her worldview. Many of the advocates who knew Mrs. Clinton as a champion for the poor and working-class women felt betrayed in 1996 when, as first lady, she supported Mr. Clinton's overhaul of the welfare system, which gave states more power to remove people from welfare rolls and pledged to cut federal spending on assistance for the poor by nearly $55 billion over six years. She was more skeptical about the North American Free Trade Agreement, which Mr. Clinton signed into law in 1993 and which has also been accused of hurting American workers.

After being elected in New York to the United States Senate in 2000, Mrs. Clinton had another constituency to represent: Wall Street. In 2001, she supported bankruptcy legislation that some Democrats — most notably Elizabeth Warren, now senator from Massachusetts — argued hurt working families and single mothers, and they accused her of doing the bidding of the financial industry. Mrs. Clinton has said she worked to improve the bill.

As a presidential candidate in 2008, Mrs. Clinton angered some of her Wall Street donors when she came out early in support of the regulation of derivatives and other complicated financial products and called for eliminating the "carried interest" loophole that allowed some financiers to avoid paying millions in income taxes. She also said that as president, she would create a cabinet-level position to fight poverty.

When the housing market collapsed, Mrs. Clinton, who had returned to the Senate full time after Mr. Obama defeated her, proposed legislation similar to a New Deal-era program that would allow the government to help homeowners refinance their mortgages. She voted in favor of the Emergency Economic Stabilization Act of 2008, which led to the Troubled Asset Relief Program and the multibillion-dollar bailout for automakers .

Last month, Mrs. Clinton reiterated her support for the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulation law. "Attacking financial reform is risky and wrong," she wrote on Twitter.

As she dives back into domestic policy, Mrs. Clinton faces an economy in which, even amid steady job growth, weekly earnings for low- and middle-income workers have remained virtually unchanged for 15 years.

“Where has the money gone?” asked Robert B. Reich, a secretary of labor during the Clinton administration. “That is the topic that is embarrassing for people to talk about, particularly in Washington, because even mentioning it creates the potential charge of class warfare.”

Mr. Reich, who recently sent Mrs. Clinton a five-page memo laying out his ideas, said candidates in both parties needed to abandon the politically safe discussion of upward mobility for the poor and middle class that dominated the 1990s, and instead take on the stickier issue of income distribution.

“Upward mobility, equal opportunity — those are safe phrases and safe aspirations,” he said in an interview. “I don’t want to minimize their importance, but they obscure the real issue.”

Mr. Reich is one of some 200 economists and academics who have offered Mrs. Clinton ideas and guidance as she settles on an economic doctrine. Several of Mr. Clinton’s former advisers, including Alan S. Blinder, Robert E. Rubin and Mr. Summers, maintain influence. But Mrs. Clinton has cast a wide net that also includes Joseph E. Stiglitz, a Nobel laureate in economics who has written extensively about inequality; Alan B. Krueger, a professor at Princeton and co-author of “Inequality in America ”; and Peter R. Orszag, a former director of the Office of Management and Budget under President Obama. Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist who focuses on retirement issues, is also playing a prominent role.

Last month in Washington, a 17-person commission convened by the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank with close ties to Mrs. Clinton, presented a 166-page report on “inclusive prosperity,” which is among the numerous economic blueprints Mrs. Clinton has reviewed. For some, the solutions proposed by the committee, of which Mr. Summers was co-chairman, did not go far enough.

Dean Baker, an economist and co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research, has pushed the idea of a government fee on the sale or purchase of certain financial assets, which he believes could hold Wall Street accountable while funding social services. “Clinton people didn’t want to go near it,” Mr. Baker said.

Mrs. Clinton has not commented on the financial transaction tax or on profit-sharing.

She has expressed support for many of the proposals Mr. Obama laid out in his State of the Union address last month, signaling that they could help shape her agenda. In a post on Twitter, she said the speech had “pointed way to an economy that works for all. Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class.”

Mrs. Clinton frequently talks about the economic success of the Clinton administration , under which median family income, adjusted for inflation, increased to $56,080 in 1999 from $48,884 in 1993, compared with a decline to $51,017 in 2012 from $55,987 in 2000, according to census data. But she has acknowledged that a globalized economy calls for new ideas, and many are urging her to go beyond her comfort zone and address the deeper frustrations of those who have not shared in that economy’s benefits.

“Long-term answers about education and skills that help change mobility don’t get at the current frustrations and aggravations,” said Austan D. Goolsbee, an economic adviser to Mr. Obama and a professor at the University of Chicago.

“People want to answer the question, ‘Are we going to be O.K.?’ ” Mr. Goolsbee said. “And then the natural question is, ‘Whose fault was that, and let’s go find those people.’ ”

Mandy is right. We keep emphasizing that the most significant pain point for people is that the belief the decked is stacked against them in favor of this at the top. And they're not wrong.

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts. She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder, a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch, a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign

Subject: Israel and Iran: Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem (JPPI)

Dear Jake,

I thought it might be useful for the campaign to give you a quick summary of some of the points that were made at the JPPI conference we had on Monday and Tuesday of this week at Glen Cove, New York. Dennis Ross and I co-chair JPPI, which is based in Jerusalem, and was created by the Jewish Agency of Israel ten years ago to be a think tank for strategic issues facing Israel, the Diaspora, and USG-Israel relations. We have a group of fellows, like retired General Michael Herzog (brother of the opposition leader), Avi Gil and others. At the conference, we had Natan Sharansky, who heads the Jewish Agency; leading Jewish organizational leaders (e.g. heads of major UJA Federations around the country); leading rabbis (e.g. Norman Kurtz in Chicago, and Eric Yoffie); academics from Harvard to UCLA; a Member of the Canadian Parliament and former Cabinet Minister (Irwin Cotler)l Middle East experts like David Makovsky, Martin Indyk, and, of course, Dennis Ross, as well as Henry Kissinger and Eric Schmidt of Google, who talked about high tech in Israel. Moreover, Malcolm Honlein, the president of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations (who I put together with Hillary through you and Huma), was there for the whole two day conference. and spoke on several occasions. We had a signficant number of Israelis there, as well.

1. ISRAEL

(1) The new Netanyahu government has very little flexibility on the peace process, given its right-wing tilt.

(2) While solid majorities of the Israeli public (over 60%) continue to support the two state solution, only a minority believe it is feasible, given Palestinian intransigence.

(3) A number of people, including, interestingly, Malcolm Honlein, felt the Prime Minister should now accept the last Kerry offer as a basis for resuming negotiations. Evidently, the last version given to Bibi did not contain language on Jerusalem (which he cannot accept), while the last version given to Abbas contained the language (but they still rejected it).

(4) There was a clear consensus that the BDS/anti-delegitimization movement against Israel was growing in Europe, and was an increasing threat.

(5) There was a grave concern that the Obama Administration, once the Iran nuclear negotiations are out of the way, will support some form of the French proposal for a new UN Resolution to supplant UN Resolution 242, endorsing the two-state solution, with 1967 borders, and with Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state. Several people felt that given the impasse in the peace process, Israel's argument that this should be left to negotiations, had a hollow ring to it. If this is going to happen, then it should be framed in ways that force the Palestinians to make tough choices, like ending claims to the "right of return". But the safest political position is to oppose what will be seen as an effort to "impose" a solution both sides will reject.

(6) There was a feeling on the part of some that Gaza was likely to blow-up again, a combination of Hamas rearming and rebuilding their tunnels, and the impact of the embargo, which has not been loosened.

(7) Israel needed to be more creative to take advantage of the open window for cooperating with the Sunni states (Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, Egypt, Jordan) against their common enemy, Iran.

(8) Most troubling was the pervasive feeling that the US has withdrawn from a leadership position in the Middle East, leaving our allies in the Arab world, and Israel, to fend for themselves. The level of vitriol against the President was striking, to such a degree that one participant urged that he was being unfairly demonized.

2. ANTI-SEMITISM/ANTI-ZIONISM

(1) There was genuine belief that there is a substantial rise in anti-Semitism in Europe (a topic I addressed at some length). This is most evident in France (where 7000 French Jews left in 2014 for Israel, with almost double that amount expected this year); Belgium; parts of Sweden (Malmo); the Netherlands; Greece; Hungary; Ukraine; but even in the UK. Roger Cukierman, the long-time head of the CRIF, French Jewry's central organization, cited several examples of the growth of anti-Semitism during my negotiations with the French government for payments for people deported on the French railway during World War II, as Secretary Kerry's Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues. Thus, in 2001, when his first term began, 90% of school-age French Jews attended public schools; now only 30% do so, because of the intimidation in schools. It is dangerous to wear a kipot (head-covering) on the Metro. Argentine Jews are also increasingly fearful, in part because of their government's close relations with Iran, which is widely seen as having planned and funded the Hezbollah attacks in the 1990s against the Jewish community center (AMIA), and the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires.

(2) Modern-day anti-Semitism is a product of a combination of factors:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(a) Neo-Nazi/right wing parties, which have long had an anti-Semitic strain, like Le Pen's National Front in France.
(b) Left-wing parties/academics, who oppose Israel's settlement policy and occupation and import their opposition on Jews, who are seen (wrongly) as surrogates for Israel.
(c) Angry, disaffected, unintegrated Muslim young people, who identify with the Palestinians as the underdogs and address their anger for their plight and that of the Palestinians at Jews in their countries.

(3) French Prime Minister Valls estimates there are some 3000 European-born Muslims fighting in Syria and Iraq, 1000 from France, who come back to Europe, armed and trained jihadists. This was precisely the profile of the suspect in the Brussels Jewish Museum attack last year.

(4) The growth in anti-Semitism, and anti-Zionism is not limited to Europe. There is a greater security fear among Jews in both the U.S., Europe, and key Latin American countries. It was reported that 14 AEPi fraternity houses on American campuses were subject to some form of desecration. Several people said that "American campuses were our Europe".

(5) Malcolm Honlein placed special emphasis on the rise of anti-Semitism in his remarks. He said that the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations was catalyzing efforts to create a Global Forum to deal with this phenomenon, to track it, exchange information about it, and develop new ways to combat it. He said that Israel had a role to play, as well.

3. DIVISIONS WITH THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMUNITY OVER ISRAEL POLICY.

(1) There are increasingly sharp left-right divisions (J Street vs. AIPAC) within the American Jewish community over Israel. Remarkably, rabbis are reluctant to discuss Israel in their sermons for fear of alienating one faction or another.

(2) There was now a big debate over which groups can march in the annual New York City Israeli Independence Day parade, which take more liberal positions (e.g., New Israel Fund, J Street). It was generally felt best to have a "big tent" so the Democratic Party left-leaning people were not excluded.

(3) The kind of robust debate that occurs in Israel over Israeli policy, is blunted here by attacks against those who oppose the current government's policies in the West Bank.

(4) There was a clearly established (Pew and Gallup polls) drop in support for Israel among self-identified Democrats (now under 50%, with over 80% for Republicans). This could feed into making Israel a partisan issue (one of the problems with Bibi's speech to Congress) for the first time in its history, a dangerous situation.

4. IRAN NUCLEAR NEGOTIATIONS AND BEYOND

(1) This was the most emotional issue. Most of the participants who spoke on the topic (Sharansky, Kissinger, Honlein, Makovsky, Ross) were deeply skeptical of the Iranian nuclear negotiations. Clearly, Honlein and AIPAC will mount a major effort to block the agreement. There was a real foreboding (one participant called it a "panic") that the American Jewish community was going to be involved in a confrontation with the Administration, that the Republicans would use to try to drive a further wedge with Jewish voters over Israel-related issues.

(2) At the same time, there was a recognition (e.g. Kissinger) that the President would be able to overcome a veto override fight, although just barely.

(3) It was important to reassure Israel and Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States that any nuclear deal with Iran did not presage broader cooperation with Iran on regional issues. (Kissinger agreed, but felt it was inevitable over time, because Iran is a real country, with a long history)

(3) Several speakers (e.g. Ross) suggested that Israel should now begin to talk with the White House about ways to repair the damage to the relationship over the nuclear talks (if there is an agreement). Indeed, the President proposed to Bibi, in his call after the formation of the government, just that, but was rebuffed, seeing any cooperation as signaling he was giving up the fight against the deal.

(4) The options for a post-agreement reassurance included:

(a) Reassurance that the agreement would not lead to a new U.S.-Iranian alliance in the region, at the expense of our traditional alliances.
(b) Sophisticated military weapons to defend themselves against a resurgent Iran.
(c) Defense treaties, that an attack by Iran would be considered an attack against the U.S. (But this was fraught with difficulty; would it be all forms of attack or only a nuclear attack)
(d) Development of a common agenda with Israel, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf States. This has not been initiated.

(5) The "snap-back" of sanctions was felt to be impractical. What would constitute a violation? Who would make the determination? Which sanctions would be re-imposed (US, EU, UN)?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(6) There needed to be a clear declaration after the 10/15 year period of the agreement, that a nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable, and the U.S. would every means to stop it. Likewise, the U.S. could not afford to disengage from the region, and had to lead the coalition against Iran.

(7) There was almost no one who subscribed to the Administration's hope that over the 10/15 year period of the agreement, the Iranian regime would moderate. Far from it, the end of sanctions and the massive amount of money that would flow to Iran would strengthen the regime, provide more funds to support terrorist groups, and embolden them in the region.

I hope this is helpful in shaping Hillary's positions on these difficult issues. But more broadly, she needs to understand the great angst in the Jewish community over the cascade of challenges I have described. The empathy and appreciation she can demonstrate, would itself be important and reassuring.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

Main Topics: Maliki's Withdrawal Statement, Immigration Policy, Tax Policy

Summary of Shift: Congressional approval hits a record low. Iranian officials continue to voice confidence that Israel will not follow through with its saber rattling. The salmonella mystery continues to puzzle officials and frustrate some pundits. The EPA accuses Cheney of deleting congressional testimony on climate change. Pakistan denies involvement in Kabul car bombing. In Iraq 20% of US armored vehicles are out of service. Exports to Iran are a booming source of US business. Hurricane Bertha receives a downgrade to storm level 1. Russia seems to have issued a vague sort of threat to the US in the face of a Czech-US missile defense plan. Repeated mentions of the fabulous G-8 summit menu played on cable and broadcast programs.

Matthews Holds Hegset's Feet to the Fire on Iraq (MSNBC 07/08/08 5:01pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: First, Iraqi officials are calling for a timetable for US troops to withdrawal from their country. Pete Hegset, who is with the group, Vets for Freedom, and John Soltz, is with the group, Votevets.com. . . I want you to look at what these fellows are saying. Here's Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki's statement. Here's what he has to say about us leaving: quote, "The current trend is to reach the agreement on the memorandum of understanding, either for the departure of US forces or a memorandum of understanding to put a timetable on their withdrawal. In all cases the basis for any agreement will be respect for the full sovereignty of Iraq." And then a further statement. Here's Iraqi national security adviser Rubaie's quote . . . : "There should not be any permanent bases in Iraq unless those bases are under Iraqi control. We would not accept any memorandum of understanding with the US side that has no obvious and specific dates for the foreign troops—" That's what they're calling us now, "withdrawal from Iraq." . . . they're telling us a timetable or to leave now. They're saying no permanent bases. They're making these statements publicly. How can our people, in this country, like John McCain and George Bush accuse the Democrats of being for being for cutting and running and surrender if the people over, who host us, there are telling us they want us to set a timetable . . . ?

PETE HEGSET: All in all, I think this is a very good thing. We wouldn't be in this political situation where Maliki is making political statements during complex negotiations if we hadn't surged and created the conditions so he can do that. This is political progress when the government feels empowered enough to say you guys can now move on out because we can control our own situation. We can take care of al-Qaeda. This is a good political negotiation that's occurring—

MATTHEWS: Then why do the administration officials come out and say they don't agree with this? They don't think we should be setting timetables . . .

HEGSET: They said we will withdrawal. We want to withdrawal. I think this is back and forth in negotiations—

MATTHEWS: No. You're waffling. They're saying we want a timetable. President bush and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain have said no timetables.

HEGSET: Certainly, the State Department and others have said, it's based on conditions on the ground. And Maliki said that as well, that, okay, yes, this is tied to conditions on the ground as well.

MATTHEWS: That's not what he's saying.

HEGSET: He has said that in other interviews.

MATTHEWS: Ok, let's try it. Let's try it with John. Did you hear what he said?

JOHN SOLTZ: I heard what he said.

MATTHEWS: What did he say?

SOLTZ: It looks to me like Maliki endorsed Sen. Barack Obama for president today . . . it's absolutely ridiculous at this point that the Republican -- the leader of the Republican party, that George Bush and John McCain think our soldiers should fight and die wanting security and prosperity in Iraq more than Iraqis want it themselves. . .

MATTHEWS: . . . the Iraqi government says they want a timetable for us to withdraw. I want to ask you, Pete, one more time, or several more times, doesn't that clash with this administration's position, we will not set a timetable?

HEGSET: This administration, I believe, all those that have served over there want to come home as soon as possible . . . the Iraqi government is saying we're much closer to taking over politically.

MATTHEWS: Let me ask you, Pete . . . do you personally support a timetable?

HEGSET: I believe it needs to be based on conditions on the ground—

MATTHEWS: No, that's not a timetable. Conditions on the ground is saying we play as we see it when the time comes. That says we don't set a timetable . . . do you support us leaving at any agreed time . . . do you agree with the Iraqi government?

HEGSET: We need to work alongside the Iraqi government to ensure that we leave behind a stable state—

MATTHEWS: I don't know what that means.

HEGSET: That Maliki can control.

MATTHEWS: Maliki says he wants us out now or to set a timetable. Do you agree with that?

HEGSET: Maliki wants us out as soon as possible, we want out as soon as possible.

MATTHEWS: That's not what he's saying.

HEGSET: That is what he's saying.

MATTHEWS: He's saying he wants timetable. Do you want a timetable, yes or no?

HEGSET: Do I want a timetable? We want out as soon as possible.

MATTHEWS: Do we want out March of next year? March two years from now, April of next year, that's called a timetable. Are we going to have a timetable for leaving Iraq or are we going to stay there indefinitely?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HEGSET: It's always been based on conditions on the ground. Violence is going down. We're bringing troops home. We are bringing troops home, Chris. And violence is going down.

MATTHEWS: You're not here to deal with the facts.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: It seems to me, if we disagree with them, then we're the occupier against their will.

SOLTZ: Aboslutely, they have a freely-elected government we established. . .

MATTHEWS: Here's what John McCain said back in 2004 to a meeting of the Counsel on Foreign Relation. The group's chair was Reter Peterson, said, quote, "What would or should we do if the post June 30th period and during that period a so-called sovereign Iraqi government asks us to leave, even if we are unhappy about the security situation at that time?" . . . here's what McCain said when asked what we would do if the Iraqi government told us to leave with a timetable: "Well, if that scenario evolves, I think it's obvious we would have to leave because if it was an elected government of Iraq . . . if it was an extremist government I think we would have to have other challenges. I don't think how we could stay when our emphasis on policy has been based on turning the Iraqi government to the Iraqi people." John McCain says if they give us a timetable or tell us to leave at a specific time we'll do it. Do you agree with that?

HEGSET: Well, yeah, this is not an extremist government, so we would pack our bags and go home. That's exactly what's happening now, we're brining troops home . . . because the surge has created the conditions where Maliki is now strong enough to make these kind of political statements. These are complex political negotiations—

MATTHEWS: Why do you keep calling them political statements?

HEGSET: That's exactly what they are.

MATTHEWS: What do you mean by a political statement?

HEGSET: Because right now the government of Iraq and the government of the United States are negotiating . . . this is all within that context.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: How do we -- how can we tell them, after the end of this year we're going to stay in their country if they don't want us there?

HEGEST: If they formally asked us to leave, I believe we would.

SOLTZ: They have . . . it seemed pretty formal today.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Gentlemen, what I find interesting is in news. For months now the debate in America is between those like John McCain who talked about a long term . . . commitment of US troops in that country, perhaps 100 years . . . now we find out that the Iraqi government does not want us there with permanent bases . . . over there unless they're working under the leadership . . . and they want us to set a timetable for leaving or else leave immediately. That runs completely against the rhetoric we've been hearing from the administration, from John McCain who have been saying they don't want to cut and run. They don't want to surrender. They want to stay there 100 years. And now the Iraqi government itself comes out and says we want you guys out of here . . . that completely undercuts the Republican administration's position and McCain's position.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Doesn't it undercut their argument?

HEGSET: Actually it reinforces the argument that if you surge you can create the political space for Iraqis to stand up—

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: . . . let's listen to what the president said and Senator McCain said. let's look at the history here.

GEOGE W. BUSH: The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run
[. . .]

AUDIENCE MEMBER TO MCCAIN: President bush has talked about us staying in Iraq for 50 years.

JOHN MCCAIN: Maybe 100. [cut to new clip] If we did what senator Obama wanted to do, that's immediate withdraw, that would mean surrender in Iraq.

MATTHEWS: . . . now we're hearing from the Iraqi government, I think, Pete you and I disagree on this. Here's the ad your group has been putting out . . .:

[plays Vets for Freedom, "Finish the Job ad"]

MATTHEWS: Over the next four years . . . what does finishing the job, mean, Pete, if the Iraqi government called for a timetable for us to leave?

HEGSET: It's exactly what's happening right now.

MATTHEWS: No. What does it, for the next four -- answer the question, Pete. Over the next four to eight years, what does finishing the job mean if the Iraqi government told us they want a timetable for withdrawal?

HEGSET: Finishing the job means an Iraqi government that doesn't allow haven to our enemies, which is exactly what's happening . . .

MATTHEWS: It's good news that the Iraqi government is telling us to leave?

HEGSET: That's political progress. They haven't formally done so, Chris. . . .

MATTHEWS: Pete is saying what basically they're saying is not for home consumption, that's not really what they want us to do.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Let me tell you. Having lived and watched through the Vietnam War, I never heard the Vietnamese government tell us to leave. this is a staggering development . . . they're telling us it's time for us to go. That runs, to me, directly counter to John McCain talking about a Korean-style situation where we're there 100 years.

Librarian with "McCain=Bush" Sign Kicked Out and Arrested at McCain Event as Campaign Adopts Bush-Like Tactics (MSNBC 07/08/08 8:41pm)
RACHAEL MADDOW: Freedom of speech and the right to assemble perhaps in the eye of the overzealous beholder when it comes to John McCain's campaign staff . . . while Mr. McCain was delivering, quote, "straight-talk" at one of his open forum town hall meetings in Denver yesterday, things were getting closed down just outside.

STAFFER: Ma'am, I need you to remove the sign, I asked you once already.

CAROL KRECK: But I'm outside. This is outside.

[. . .]

POLICE OFFICER: You have two choices. You can keep your sign here and receive a ticket for trespass or you can remove the sign and stay in line and attend this town hall meeting.

KRECK: . . . you're saying that I'm trespassing on city property--

POLICE OFFICER: No, he's saying you're trespassing on city property. [points at staffer]

KRECK: Am I being arrested?

MADDOW: The unassuming protester is part time librarian and former Denver Post reporter, Carol Kreck. Ultimately escorted off the property by four police officers. The sixty year old woman was given a citation and a court date. But because librarians are trained democracy superheroes, Ms. Kreck did not stay silent for long.

KRECK: I believe he said the ticket was for trespassing. He said if I went back into the plaza I would be arrested. [holds up sign] It says "McCain=Bush" Now, any Republican, why is that offensive? Why would a Republican . . . who voted for Bush find offensive that a sign says, Bush=McCain or McCain=Bush?

MADDOW: Progress Now Action tells Countdown that they have created a defense fund for Ms. Kreck . . . why don't we start with Ms. Kreck's question there? If her sign had said, "I heart John McCain," would she have been so swiftly booted? I think she kind of makes a good point. Why would a loyal Republican be insulted at the comparison of McCain to Bush?

JAMES MOORE: Yeah, Republican campaigns would be so much easier to run if we could just get this pesky freedom of speech thing out of the way. The truth is they really don't want to be equated with George W. Bush. It's a bad brand to be carrying forward . . . clearly there were people inside of this facility, this publicly taxed facility that was rented by the McCain campaign, there were people inside there who were expressing their opinions, probably wearing buttons. Why weren't they escorted out? I think this is an ugly kind of thing for the McCain campaign thing to have happen and to focus on instead of what was going on inside of that building.

MADDOW: . . . isn't the PR fiasco that has ensued here and that won't go away anytime soon. As you kind of alluded to earlier, isn't this fiasco probably worse and more disruptive than anything Ms. Kreck could've done . . . ?

MOORE: Well if the real issue is trying to separate themselves from George W. Bush, this isn't the way to do it. There are a number of things that the Bush campaign has done throughout which is to try to control the message, to keep dissent at a minimum and this is almost rebranding themselves as the Bush campaign but the McCain version of it . . .

John McCain's off the Cuff Joke on Iran (CNN 07/08/08 8:40pm)
[When Campbell Brown introduces this clip she reminds viewers of McCain's similar joke, the infamous 'Bomb Iran' song.]

REPORTER: We've learned that the exports to Iran [from America] increased by tenfold during the Bush administration. The biggest export was cigarettes.

JOHN MCCAIN: That's a way of killing them. [laughs] I meant that as a joke.

STEVE KORNACKI: Yeah, he meant it as a joke, but I think it reveals something very significant about this man's thinking when it comes to Iran and when it comes to the Middle East because this is the second time he's made a joke about killing Iranians. The first time, as you mentioned was when he sang along saying, 'Bomb [...] Iran.' This is a guy who, when he thinks of Iran, sees nothing but an enemy, sees nothing but a country we need to confront, we need to confront them militarily and we need to confront them aggressively. That is the only thing John McCain sees when he sees Iran. That's the view of the Middle East that he subscribes too and it's funny because you had a package at the start of the show, we talked all about how strained the US military is right now, between Iraq and between Afghanistan and this is a guy who seems to want to open up a third front on this war from day one in office.

TARA WALL: That's a stretch. I mean, come on. Iran is serious.

JESSICA YELLIN: This is the kind of thing that reinforces existing views of John McCain. People who already don't like him see this as an awful statement. People who love and think he's a real guy who makes a joke off the cuff just like real people do and the rest of the American public just isn't paying attention and doesn't care about this sort of thing.

The only red flag is, if this indicates John McCain going ranch more and more, there could be trouble down the line. We're all waiting to see if something explodes. That's the kind of thing that could get him into trouble eventually. This kind of comment doesn't.

Pfotenhauer Discusses McCain's Immigration Plan and Attacks Obama on Unrelated Issues
(MSNBC 07/08/08 11:49am)

CONTESSA BREWER: . . . [McCain] is expected to expect immigration just at the end of his speech. Is there a strategy in that?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I think Senator McCain's gonna lay out his vision for this country and moving us forward into the future and dealing with all of the challenges that we face. He's a very solutions-oriented guy as you know and so I expect him to talk about the economy, about health care and, of course, about immigration reform. It's an issue that matters very much to this community. Also about national security because that's on the mind of the average American.

BREWER: . . . his critics will say . . . he's flip flopping, that all of a sudden he's only concerned about border security and not about actual reform for the way we take in immigrants. Is that the case?

PFOTENHAUER: Not at all . . . let's go ahead and address the issue. Sen. McCain has obviously made it a hallmark of his career, particularly for the last six to eight years to work towards immigration reform, comprehensive immigration reform. It's been a model of a bipartisanship. You don' have to take our word for it, you can take Ted Kennedy's word for it. It failed in the last time through. And there were a couple of reasons for that. One is that there were real concerns that border security was not being given the emphasis that it should and Sen. McCain is addressing that. But the other is there was a concerted effort by the Democratic leadership who were working at the behest of labor unions to kill the bill and Barack Obama carried their water. . .

BREWER: Why is Barack Obama beating John McCain? This recent Gallup poll has him losing to Barack Obama by thirty points among Latino voters.

PFOTENHAUER: I think that's probably largely representative of the generic ballot difference between

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats and Republicans. But also because the Republican party has been associated with concerns about immigration reform. Now John McCain breaks the mold for the Republicans on this. He's someone who never blinked at immigration reform, the way he doesn't blink at any problem facing our country . . . but whether it's immigration reform or NAFTA, I mean Sen. Obama's going to have to explain his position on wanting to renegotiate that . . . he's far to the left of even the pro-choice movement on abortion, I think he's eventually going to have a very hard sell for this voting block . . .

Holtz-Eakin Touts McCain's Tax Plan Over Obama's (MSNBC 07/08/08 2:36pm)

JOHN HARWOOD: Doug, let me ask but that poll we've been talking about showing Obama ahead two to one among Hispanic voters given where John McCain was on immigration reform standing with Ted Kennedy, supporting that bipartisan bill, why is he struggling at this point in the campaign?

DOUGLAS HOLTZ-EAKIN: He's going to compete for votes across this nation and do so successfully using the recipe that we saw on immigration reform. He has recognized the great challenges all across America from immigration, whether at the border, at the work site, undocumented aliens, or folks who want to pursue the American dream. He's committed to solving these problems. This is more than plans.

This is about matching words and actions. If you look at what Senator Obama is doing today, he's running around America promising everyone—95% of them—a tax cut. When he goes back to the senate, he votes twice to raise taxes on people making as little as $32,000. When John McCain left the campaign trail he went to pursue immigration reform, reaching across the aisle with Ted Kennedy and putting at risk his own political future. Words and actions have to match and that's what gets votes.

HARWOOD: By voting against those Bush tax cuts in 2001, wasn't John McCain voting for higher taxes for the same people?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: John McCain has always believed you should control spending and compare that with low taxes and that's a recipe for growth and that's what Americans need right now. Especially right now, what Americans need is a job that is foundation of the dreams and prosperity. Creating jobs and having great in the economy is the number one priority and that, in the end, is what John McCain is about. Every policy is through that lens.

TAMRON HALL: I want to play something that Senator Obama had to say about taxes in the '90s and get your response on the other side.

BARACK OBAMA: This applies to me as well. The fact of the matter is that, if we went back to the Bush tax rates that existed under Bill Clinton in the 1990s, rich people were still rich back then. I mean, you remember the 1990s weren't that long ago. If you were rich then, you were doing fine. You didn't need that extra tax cut from George Bush.

HALL: All right, you heard him there. Will that cost him many votes or will you have folks at home struggling to fill up their family car and say, 'That's the truth. I'm going vote for this guy because of it.'

HOLTZ-EAKIN: They're going to vote for John McCain because he's got the recipe for their job. Senator Obama's ideological drive to raise taxes will catch in the cross fires small businesses that are the heart of job creation in the United States. John McCain has not given a tax cut for wealthy.

Top rate is 35% right now and it will be in the future. He'll make sure the small businesses have access to capital. Dividends and capital gains rates will stay at 15%. They won't go down. The only tax cut John McCain is proposing is one that corporate America will get to keep jobs in America. Right now, those good jobs, the ones with health benefits, retirement benefits are walking overseas to places like Ireland with lower taxes.

John McCain wants those workers to have their jobs here in America and that's what his policies are all about—not about tax cuts for wealthy, all the demagoguery not withstanding.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HARWOOD: As you know, the Obama campaign says that John McCain's ideological commitment to cutting taxes will create big problems. You may have heard a few minutes ago a reference to the McCain economic plan as voodoo two, saying that it would not add up, in terms of the deficit. The democrats put out a release yesterday saying that John McCain would have to cut Medicare 81% to balance the budget, given the numbers you guys have put out. What about that? Do they add up?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: The plan that doesn't add up is Barack Obama's. He's promising a tax cut to 95% of Americans, spend a trillion and a half dollars over the next five years and somehow have it add up. What John McCain is going to do is return to the discipline that we saw in the late 1990s under that democrat voodoo, Bill Clinton.

When republicans and democrats got together and put together tight spending controls every year, kept the economy growing, produced the revenues necessary for the federal government and brought the budget to balance and then ultimately surplus.

HARWOOD: You agree he can't get there with cutting earmarks, right?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: And he doesn't plan to. It's a return to a proven tactic, which is using the taxpayer's money wisely and the earmarks are part of that, but also a a bipartisan approach to commitment to reduce spending.

HARWOOD: What about the lines that Tamron was reading from Barack Obama, that is republicans say the rich weren't rich enough in the 1990s. Are you concerned that the populist rhetoric will take a toll out of you in the campaign?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: No. John McCain looks at every crowd and sees American workers and everything in this campaign is around making sure they have a good job. Health insurance costs aren't too high. They don't have mandate to pay for something they can't afford. Education's work [sic]. We don't throw money into systems that don't graduate kids. Energy is cheap, clean and available in the United States. A broad commitment to controlling our energy future and taking the American economy out of the hands of those in the Middle East who control it at the moment. This is a recipe for an economy that grows rapidly, price jobs to American workers and it's a comprehensive plan that will achieve those ends.

Re: Newspaper Presidential Endorsements and National Security

Conventional wisdom views national security and foreign policy issues as conservative turf. But over the past few years, and especially in this presidential election, progressives have become more assertive in outlining their own vision of national security. Today progressives are speaking about national security with greater confidence than at any time in recent memory and have consistently demonstrated the inadequacy of the conservative world view.

The payoff in this campaign, even with economic issues seizing the headlines, is clear in a National Security Network review of newspaper endorsements nationwide. Overall:

As of October 29, 2008, Barack Obama received 231 endorsements from newspapers with readership of over 21 million people while 102 papers with readership of 7 million endorsed John McCain;
46 newspapers that endorsed President Bush in 2004 went for Senator Obama during this cycle;
158 of Obama's endorsements specifically cited foreign policy as an important reason for giving him their support.

In the editorial boards' own words, the choice of Obama has much to do with several common national security themes: the inappropriateness of McCain's temperament for a dangerous world, the similarity of his ideas to those of President Bush, the need to repair our image around the world, the priority of the challenge in Afghanistan, and the desire to have a foreign policy that includes smart diplomacy. The prevalence of these common themes provides an important example of progressive national security ideas having a pivotal impact on the mainstream political dialogue. What follows is a summary of these themes:

McCain's "temperament" with regard to world affairs was a major reason for Obama endorsements. 42 percent of editorial boards that endorsed Obama contrasted the temperament of the two candidates when discussing the commander-in-chief test. McCain's "maverick" style is not a quality Americans seek in a commander-in-chief – and newspapers saw it this to be a clear national security problem. The San Francisco Chronicle writes, "The Illinois senator was…deliberative - in contrast with McCain's quick-draw provocation - when Russia invaded Georgia in August." The Stockton Record says " [McCain] tends to shoot from the hip and go on gut instinct. The nation cannot go through four more years of literally and figuratively shooting now and asking questions later." The Detroit Free Press writes that McCain's campaign "has been marked by stunts and gimmicks, gaffes and shifts that call into question McCain's temperament and, most of all, his judgment." McCain's temperament is often unfavorably compared to that of Senator Barack Obama, which is praised as "calm and deliberate." In general, a common theme throughout the endorsements is the observation that McCain is "a hair-trigger hawk" like Bush, a fact that undermines his experience with foreign policy. The Bangor Daily News slams his "reckless choice of Sarah Palin," his "boiling moralism," and his "dismaying temperament." [San Francisco Chronicle (CA), 10/17/2008 . The Stockton Record (CA), 9/26/2008 , Detroit Free Press (MI), 10/18/2008 . Bangor Daily News (ME), 10/18/2008]

The similarity of McCain's foreign policy to that of President Bush is a consistent theme. 32 percent of editorials endorsing Obama argued that McCain's foreign policy was too similar to that of George W. Bush. The Durango Herald writes that McCain is "intellectually and emotionally trapped in a bygone era" and that like Bush he offers "more of the wars" that have "mired future generations in debt." The Palm Beach Post contradicts McCain's statement during the debate that "I am not President Bush," calling it "one last failed attempt to convince enough voters that a McCain administration would be much different from the Bush administration" on issues such as Iraq. The Fort Wayne Journal Gazette continues the criticism of McCain's Iraq policy: McCain "has persisted in flogging failed policies. With McCain…more American blood will be spilled." The Burlington Hawk Eye says "Nearly all of Bush's initiatives won favor from Republican John McCain," which "led us into unnecessary war in Iraq" and "eroded our credibility around the world." The Kansas City Star cautions that "Although claiming to be a change agent, he is following in Bush's footsteps on…war in Iraq" [The Durango Herald

The need to repair US image around the world is central. 54 percent of editorials endorsing Obama cited the need to repair America's image and embrace diplomacy. The St. Louis Post Dispatch made its endorsement because of "the damage that has been done to America's moral standing in the world in the last eight years — by a preemptory war, a unilateralist foreign policy and by policies that have treated both the Geneva Conventions and our own Bill of Rights as optional." The Quad-City Times writes, "We support a presidential candidate predisposed toward reaching out to world leaders, not one entrenched in Cold War-style standoffs." The Sacramento Bee confirms that Obama "will begin to restore America's relations with its allies and its standing in the community of nations." The Seattle Post Intelligencer writes that diplomacy should be "fundamental, not an afterthought on the way to war." The presence of this theme indicates that Americans are aware that our image around the world has been tarnished by the last 8 years, and we must restore our standing not through force, but through engagement. [St. Louis Post-Dispatch (MO), 10/12/08 . Quad-City Times (IA/IL), 10/26/08 . Sacramento Bee (CA), 10/12/2008 Seattle Post-Intelligencer (WA), 10/6/08]

The progressive narrative -- that Afghanistan is the central foreign policy challenge and Iraq is a distraction -- is widely accepted. 31 percent of editorials endorsing Obama argued that the Bush administration's failed Iraq policy has distracted us from the real danger in Afghanistan. In fact, 15 of the 46 newspapers that supported Bush in '04 agreed this year that "Our military is bogged down in Iraq while terrorists are regrouping in Afghanistan" and cited the situation in Afghanistan as being a reason for their endorsement. The Naples Daily News acknowledges that, "Obama has more clarity and urgency on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. He would set a course for bringing troops home from their victory in the former and move resources, allies and local and regional support to prosecute the latter more strategically." The San Francisco Chronicle, a newspaper with over 370,000 readers, says, "the threat of terrorism has not gone away. As Obama has noted, the invasion of Iraq diverted resources and attention from what should be the main front on terrorism: the rugged terrain along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, where al Qaeda and, presumably, its leader, Osama bin Laden, retreated after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States." The South Florida Sun Sentinel faults McCain for supporting the Iraq war and for supporting Bush in "prioritizing Iraq over Afghanistan, and in prioritizing Saddam Hussein over Osama bin Laden." The Yakima Herald Republic says "Obama plans to put together a reasonable exit strategy for Iraq -- something lacking from the get-go with the Bush administration. At the same time, he repeatedly said during debates that Afghanistan is where the focus should be and that he will go after Osama bin Laden and 'take him out' if given the opportunity." [Las Cruces Sun News (NM), 10/18/08 . San Francisco Chronicle (CA), 10/17/2008 . Naples Daily News (FL), 10/19/08 . South Florida Sun-Sentinel (FL), 10/26/08 . Yakima Herald-Republic (WA), 10/18/08]

The American public recognizes that we need to talk to our enemies. In a campaign season where the issue of talking to our enemies has become so important, it is significant that 54 percent of Obama's endorsements called for more diplomacy while 16 percent specifically support engaging in tough diplomacy with America's adversaries. The Contra Costa Times asks, "When did it hurt to sit down and talk to our enemies?" The Gainesville Sun faults McCain for his "Cold War-era attitudes towards global conflict resolution." The Register-Guard of Oregon praises "Obama's readiness, much derided by McCain, to conduct diplomacy with hostile nations. It's easy to characterize such willingness as appeasement — easy and wrong." These endorsements represent a realization, as the Orlando Sentinel says, that engaging "in tough negotiations with enemies is not naive or irresponsible; it's an approach followed before by presidents from both parties." [Contra Costa Times (CA), 10/12/2008 . The Gainesville Sun (FL) 10/26/08 , Register-Guard (OR), 10/18/08 , Orlando Sentinel (FL), 10/19/08]

CHARLIE BLACK TERROR ATTACK COMMENT NEWS

Terror Strike Would Help McCain, Top Adviser Says (Washington Post 6/24/08)
By Michael Shear
A top adviser to Sen. John McCain said that a terrorist attack in the United States would be a political benefit to the presumptive Republican presidential nominee, a comment that was immediately disputed by the candidate and denounced by his Democratic rival. Charles R. Black Jr... said...that a fresh terrorist attack "certainly would be a big advantage to him." He also said that the December assassination of former Pakistani prime minister Benazir Bhutto, while "unfortunate," helped McCain win the Republican primary by focusing attention on national security....The comments also returned the political spotlight to McCain's advisers and, in particular, to Black, who has drawn criticism for his long lobbying career and his representation of controversial foreign governments....

McCain aide apologizes for terrorist-attack comment (LA Times 6/24/08)
By Don Frederick
Charlie Black has had his moment of straight talk -- and chances are he's not going to let it happen again... First, Black described the assassination of Pakistani political leader Benazir Bhutto in late December as an "unfortunate event" -- but one that boosted McCain's stock just before the must-win New Hampshire primary... Then he longtime Washington lobbyist went further. Asked what the political ramifications of another terrorist attack on U.S. soil might be for McCain, Black told Fortune, "Certainly it would be a big advantage to him."

McCain adviser apologizes for September 11 comment (Reuters 6/23/08)
A top adviser to Republican presidential candidate John McCain apologized on Monday after he was quoted as saying a September 11-type attack before the November election would benefit McCain....Black's comment to Fortune was a distraction for McCain as he seeks to catch up to Obama in the polls, where Obama leads by about 6 percentage points...Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry, who lost to President George W. Bush in the 2004 election based largely on who would make the country safer, said Black's comment smacked of "the worst of the Rove-Bush fear playbook," a reference to Bush's former political adviser, Karl Rove.

Charlie Black has already apologized for, and John McCain distanced himself from, the advisor's comment that a terror strike would help McCain, but Obama spokesman Bill Burton still weighs in...The fact that John McCain's top advisor says that a terrorist attack on American soil would be a "big advantage" for their political campaign is a complete disgrace, and is exactly the kind of politics that needs to change.

McCain Proposes a $300 Million Prize for a Next-Generation Car Battery (NYT 06/24/08)

McCain advisors step away from Bush, but not too far (AFP 06/23/08)
The Republican party's presumptive presidential nominee John McCain is engaged in a delicate dance, distancing himself from US President George W. Bush while courting the conservative ideals of the outgoing president's party.Few of McCain's top advisors are well known to the general public, and even fewer are directly linked to the highly unpopular Bush administration. However neoconservatives, whose thinking has directed Bush's foreign policy following the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States, are ever-present and powerful in McCain's inner circle.

McCain's Crucial 73 Days (Washington Post Blog 6/23/08)
By Chris Cillizza
The coverage of Barack Obama's decision last week to forego public financing for the general election centered on the fact that the Illinois senator is almost certain to have a considerable spending edge in the fall campaign over John McCain. What was largely overlooked, however, is how Obama's decision impacts McCain's fundraising between now and when he formally accepts the party's nomination on Sept. 4. Since McCain opted out of public financing for the primary race, he can raise and spend as much as he likes over the next 73 days.

...What's actually disturbing is the Swift Boat Media's complete indifference to McCain's bald-faced hypocrisy on the same issue. Amidst all the attacks on Obama's "flip-flop," how much have you read in the MSM about the fact that McCain has "completely reversed himself" on public financing -- and is currently breaking the law on a daily basis, making a mockery out of a campaign finance system he helped create?

McCain Hypocrisy on Obama's Opt-Out Decision (Mother Jones Blog 6/23/08)
By Jonathan Stein
The McCain campaign has sharply criticized Barack Obama's decision to become the first general election presidential candidate since the 1970s to opt out of the public financing system, a decision Obama can afford because of his stunning success with hundreds of thousands of low-dollar donors...But McCain, a longtime foe of Big Money in politics, once had a friendlier view of presidential fundraisers like Obama.

Cindy McCain to headline fundraiser in London (AP 6/23/08)
Cindy McCain, wife of Republican presidential hopeful John McCain, was hosting a campaign fundraiser in London on Thursday after she completes a humanitarian visit to southeast Asia. The evening event was expected to raise more than $500,000 for the Arizona senator's presidential bid, a person familiar with the planning said Monday. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger was scheduled to join Cindy McCain as a headliner of the event.

Obama Says McCain Is Insensitive to Women's Issues (WSJ 06/23/08)
By Christopher Cooper
Barack Obama opened up another line of attack against Republican rival John McCain, accusing the Arizona senator of being insensitive to women's issues. At a roundtable-style event at a wholesale bakery in Albuquerque, the Illinois Democrat told about 40 women that he's committed to making sure they get "a square deal on the job."McCain is not, he said. As proof, he pointed to the Republican candidate's refusal to support legislation designed to unwind a U.S. Supreme Court decision last year that made it harder for women to sue for job discrimination.

Gitmo trial looms in election homestretch (Politico 6/23/08)

On May 9, five men currently incarcerated at the Guantanamo Bay detention center were charged in connection with the 9/11 terror attacks. Under the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which authorizes that detainee trials begin within 120 days, they could end up in a courtroom in September – almost to the day of the seventh anniversary of the attacks and right as voters start to tune in for the presidential election homestretch.

McCain's Core Advantage (Washington Post 6/24/08)
By Richard Cohen
And the same principle holds for John McCain. Like Obama, he was going to give us change, and in a sense, he has. He has abandoned his maverick persona of old and moved to assure the GOP that on most matters, he is devoutly orthodox. This is change, all right, but for most voters, who hanker for something other than what they've had for most of the last eight years, this is not much change at all.

Our view on clean campaigns: All Washington lobbyists, insiders aren't created equal (USA Today 6/24/08)
John McCain and Barack Obama are battling over many issues, from energy to trade to terrorism. But nowhere has their sparring been more intense than over which candidate is more reform-minded. Both have accepted the resignations of key aides whom the other camp attacked for being too close to special interests. And both have highly restrictive rules about the roles lobbyists can play in their campaigns. McCain has barred them from paid positions with his. Obama has banned them from contributing to his campaign and the Democratic National

No Job for Mr. Nice Guy (Washington Post 6/24/08)
By Anne Applebaum
Perhaps it's just a coincidence, but in the past few days, I've felt overwhelmed by a tsunami of commentary, all of which purports to prove the fundamental nastiness of Barack Obama or, alternatively, the deep unlikability of John McCain...The Daily Mail of London has called McCain a " self-centred womaniser who effectively abandoned his crippled [first] wife." In recent months I've also read, or been told, that John McCain snubbed the Vietnamese peasant who saved his life and is rude to his (second) wife in public...

The U.S. has been at war for years now, but ordinary Americans have never been asked to step up and make the kind of sacrifices that wars have historically required.There is no draft. Obsessing about Iran (Boston Globe 6/24/08)
By H.D.S. Greenway
THE WAR drums are beating hard in this the last summer of the Bush presidency. Israel practices bombing runs far out in the Mediterranean, refueling more than 100 fighter bombers in midair, in what is advertised as practice against Iranian nuclear facilities. The Bush Paradox (NYT 6/24/08)
By David Brooks
Let's go back and consider how the world looked in the winter of 2006-2007. Iraq was in free fall, with horrific massacres and ethnic cleansing that sent a steady stream of bad news across the world media. The American public delivered a stunning electoral judgment against the Iraq war, the Republican Party and President Bush... The additional fact is that Bush, who made such bad calls early in the war, made a courageous and astute decision in 2006. More than a year on, the surge has produced large, if tenuous, gains.

Are You Experienced? Why a U.S. senator might not trump a state legislator (Newsweek 6/23/08)
By Alan Ehrenhalt
We are in the opening days of a presidential campaign that pits youth against age, the virtues of experience against the freshness and riskiness of the new arrival. I'm not here to refute all of that: John McCain is 25 years older than Barack Obama, and he always will be. But here's something I bet you didn't know: If Obama becomes president, he will have spent more time serving as a state legislator (eight years) than anyone who has occupied the White House since Abraham Lincoln.

The Emergence of the Trans-Pacific Partnership

The Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) is the largest regional trade accord in history. It finally emerged after years of negotiations between the US and eleven Pacific Rim nations. It now faces months of scrutiny in a politically divided Congress, although the threat of amendments or a filibuster will not be an issue due to the success of the fast-track trade authority.

Let's stop here. There is no war online against ISIS in which the United States can seize victory, because there is no online victory to be seized. "Winning" a war implies specific objectives that can actually be met. On the internet, there is no clear ground to be gained, and no reliable way to measure success when it comes to countering violent extremism—as many have mentioned, you can't measure if someone decides to not join ISIS.

Climate Change, Diplomacy, and National Security - A Conversation with Foreign Minister Tony de Brum, Marshall Islands

In December, negotiators from around the world will convene in Paris to negotiate and agree to a deal to address the challenge of climate change. Their clear moral authority, as "front-line" states of climate change, shows how soft power can accelerate diplomacy.

To Joel's original point about someone to raise this point about Gowdy releasing his email, David Brock did it already - http://www.msnbc.com/msnbc/david-brock-top-hillary-clinton-ally-trey-gowdy-release-your-emails. I know we want Members, etc. to do it and will pursue but just flagging Brock did it. Also, Roy Blunt got challenged on it by Stephanopoulos on Sunday.

The other question is whether there is a member who would introduce a bill to end the FOIA exemption for Members of Congress? They should be just as transparent as they're demanding HRC be. It would put the focus on the Members keeping their emails private and would never actually pass.

Subject: Earned Media Update

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Washington Post : "Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records." [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal : " But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. "He did exactly what Hillary did," said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff "went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn't. […] The Wall Street Journal reports today: "When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio's spokeswoman said they had been deleted." (WSJ, 3/13/15)

Associated Press , "Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival." [AP, 3/7/15]

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Philadelphia, PA 06/11/08

Hi BigCampaign,
Just off the phone with our tracker Greg who was on the ground today in Philadelphia, PA. Below are the notes from our call.

Big Highlights:

- Fiorina was there in the town hall audience, clapping away
- McCain says there are corporate executives that give corporations a bad name by taking too big of a package; if there's speculation, those people should be scrutinized and possibly penalized.
- McCain repeats mention Ireland's appeal to businesses given their lower corporate tax rate. (Fiorina said this week that HP off-shored to Ireland while she was at the company).
- Oldey McOlderson asked audience members to hold microphone closer twice, including one boy who was literally standing right next to him
- Mostly stuck to his recent stump on Reform, Prosperity, Peace. Also, continued attacks on Obama as wrong on raising taxes, wrong for willingness to sit down without preconditions (and he changes his positions), and wrong as a 2nd term of Carter--tying everything to working-class issues / economy.

Philadelphia, PA: McCain Town Hall 06/11/08

Background Details:

- In audience: Carly Fiorina, Cindy McCain, John Chambers (CEO, Cisco)
- African-American woman gave first set of introductory remarks, throwing out urban slang like "John McCain's in the house!" while hitting
- Cindy McCain introduced her husband.
- 500 people. Diverse crowd. Small but packed venue.
- No protesters outside pre-event, but a small group of young people chanting "Obama" outside the event after it was over. They had a few health care signs.
- Secret Service gave our tracker some trouble. McCain staffers, on the other hand, were more accommodating.

Opening Remarks:

- Brings up Obama's bitter comments: says he doesn't believe that sentiment. And that's why we're going to win PA.
- Repeats mention of his invitation to Obama for joint town hall meetings. Instead of taking comments out of context and flashing them around on the cable shows. let's hear complete answers and complete thoughts. I've not heard from Obama, but I urge him again to accept my invitation.
- Three major challenges facing America: Reform, Prosperity, Peace.
- Reform the way we do business in DC. Congressional ratings are so low you get down to paid staffers and relatives. It's because we aren't working for Americans, we are working for us. They want us to sit down and work together- I have a record of it. By the way, I welcome those quarters of Obama's supporters here today. We need to raise taxes, eliminate wasteful pork-barrel spending (this is a GOP and Dem disease), bipartisan efforts to fix Medicare and Social Security.
- Prosperity: Americans are hurting. At the top of the list is price of gas. I will lead effort to be independent of foreign oil.
- Straight talk: I told people things they didn't want to hear as well as what they want to hear. We need to have nuclear power - environmental and national security benefits.
- Improve education in USA. Displaced worker has been a casualty of these changes. We need to talk about the lost manufacturing jobs in PA, OH, etc. Update training programs. MI and SC - I told them that the old jobs aren't coming back, but now there are new endeavors there.
- 1930s passed the Smoot-Hauley Tariff Act - Tax increases and protectionist measures sent us from a recession into a depression.

- I'm a free-trader. Attacks Obama for saying he would unilaterally re-negotiate free trade agreements.
- Peace: We're in 2 wars, we face evil radical Islamic extremism. Afghanistan is tough and we're going to have that struggle for a while, and what happens in Pakistan is going to affect it. Strongest disagreement between myself and Obama is that I believe Petraeus's assertion that the central battleground is in Iraq, I believed we needed to change strategies to the surge. Unfortunately there was enormous sacrifice, and there is nothing more precious than American blood. I go out to see our wounded at Walter Reed as often as I can. Vets hate war. I won't recall to you my experiences with loss of comrades except to the time USS Forrestal saved us. "Nothing is more precious than Americans." "If we succeed," we will see reduction in influence by Iran and by AQ. The benefits of success are that we'd have a stable government in Iraq. America is divided on this war, but Americans aren't divided on supporting the troops. There have been other wars in US history and sometimes we've had to see it through. I can inspire young Americans to serve their country--Noblest way to serve America is in uniform.

Question & Answer:

- Q1) There's a bill in Senate right now which would continue GWB's efforts to fight malaria, TB, etc. It needs to pass before the G8 to have meaning.
    - MCCAIN: I support legislation to fight AIDS in Africa. We should thank GWB and Laura Bush for that. I haven't examined that specific piece of legislation, but as Pres, I will seek to continue that effort. It's not just about money, because sometimes there are corrupt governments - especially in Africa - so sometimes American dollars don't go to their intended recipient. ONE.org does a lot of work to help.
- FOLLOW-up: Will you help us get the bill un-stuck? It's a bipartisan effort.
    - MCCAIN: I will assist in every way I can. I'm not familiar with this specific legislation, but I know how things work in Washington, and sometimes things
- Q2) As a Jewish American, I'm very worried about Israeli security and Iran. What can be done?
    - MCCAIN: Sanctions that would squeeze Iran, which has a weak economy. I am convinced that the majority of Iranian people are friendly to USA.
- Mccain: "A little closer with the microphone, please"
- Q3) How would you answer Pete Peterson (whose book "Running on Empty" quotes you on the front) in terms of your support for tax cuts in 2001 and 2003?
    - MCCAIN: Pete Peterson is exactly right. But the revenues aren't a problem. The problem is/was excessive spending. I voted against the Medicare Part D drug prescription program. You know why? Because you're paying for my prescription drugs! Let's pay for lower-income people. I voted against Farm Bill, which gives wealthy people money when there are Americans trying to keep their homes.
    - "I agree with every word that was written in that book," Running on Empty.
- Q4) Keith Todd- volunteered for McCain in SC. When Obama finally joins you in a town hall, can you remind him what Reagan said, which is that corporations collect taxes; they don't pay taxes? And it's going to be my grandma, etc. paying for it.
    - MCCAIN: There are corporate execs that are giving corporations a bad name, ones who took too big of a package. If there's speculation, those people should be scrutinized and penalized for any laws they've broken. Corporate taxes in USA is 2nd highest in the world. Businesses and other corporations set up in other countries because of their lower tax rates. I don't view my plan as a "break" for corporations; it's an incentive to keep jobs here. If they're loopholes, I want them closed; but if it's lower corporate taxes, I want them.
- Q5) What do you have to offer first-time voters versus Obama?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- McCain raises the microphone to the boy's mouth even though the boy was standing right next to him and speaking loudly and clearly into the microphone.
- MCCAIN: Mentions "very very... old" bit from SNL. We have to fix education so they can go to the schools that Cindy and I were lucky enough to send our kids to. We need to fix our broken programs. Finally, I will give you a peaceful world - because it is the youth who serve in the military.

- Q6) How are you going to make equal education opportunity possible?
  - MCCAIN: Special education is very important (Cindy taught it). Rise of autism is affecting Americans. In NOLA, they have 30 charter schools, which provide competition to the public school system. I want every parent in USA to have the same choice that my family has. Congress is about to do away with voucher program, but parents want it. Choice; competition; special education; reward teachers' merit, eliminate those without it. NCLB needs to be fixed. More opportunities to teach, e.g. Troops to Teach.

- Q7) What are you going to do about teen gangs / crime?
  - MCCAIN: I'm going to have to work very hard to let them know that there's a better life than the one they see aroudn them. From a macro sense, there was good news the other day that overall crime is going down - though that's of small consolation to cities facing the crime. I think they need mentors. I was somewhere, a group of boys go every day and mentor "a young African American." Some of these gangs have become international, coming from Nicaragua and Guatemala. And incarceration a lot of times makes these people worse off. A lot of these problems are drug-related. For the first time, the Mexican government is doing a good job clamping down on these drug cartels. Straight talk: as long as there's demand, there's going to be supply, so we need to stop the demand. Methamphetamines are a problem. People who have been through the life can serve the best role models for the youth.

- Q8) Seniors are concerned about health care and Social Security and institutionalized longterm care. What will you do to help?
  - MCCAIN: I want Americans to make the choices for their healthcare. Obama's proposal will mean an eventual government takeover of health care; we've seen that in other countries and we don't want that. Social Security we know what we have to do. Health care is harder to fix. (1) Encourage home health care. In AZ, we have a program where people stay at home for care and it's great. Cash-in care. Reagan said "no one ever washed a rental car;" that's the problem with health care. I hate to keep referring to Carly and John, but they'll tell you technology is key. It will reduce medical errors. We need competition.

- Q9) You compared Obama to President Carter. And a lot of HRC supporters aren't happy with Obama. How will you reach out to them and explain that spend-and-tax liberals are not the right answer for America's future?
  - MCCAIN: A lot of attacks on me are that I'd be Pres Bush's third term. But Obama would be a 2nd term of Carter, from national security, taxation, etc--the policies of the 60s and 70s that failed. I respect Obama and his hard-fought primary battle. We differ on policies: taxes, national security needs. The point is the American people didn't get to know me yesterday and they know that I've always put my country first and my party second.

- Q10) What's your plan to help students with high student loan costs?
  - MCCAIN: Make loans more affordable and accessible. We have to reward people for public service, we have to provide our vets with education benefits but we also have to provide incentives for them to stay in military.

- Q11) Would you consider opening ANWR to drilling? And what could be done to encourage oil companies to refine more?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MCCAIN: I believe this area should be kept in pristine preservation. But I respect the rights of states to control what goes on off their shores. We should tell CA et al that we will increase their revenue if they allow oil exploration off their coasts.

- Q12) Works for DE GOP. What advice for people who want to go to public office or to serve?
  - Recognize it's a tough business. Sometimes there are disappointments. There's no perfect servant. I've had the honor of serving literally my whole life. My time in Vietnam prison was tough, but a great experience to serve in the company of heroes. When I whine about things being taken out of context, etc., I remember that I've been through much tougher times than a political campaign.

Subject:	Israel and Iran

Dear Jake,

Dennis Ross and I had an hour-plus meeting Sunday morning with the PM and full Israeli Cabinet, in our capacity as co-chairs of the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem.
While we made presentations on a number of topics, Iran and BDS were the most important and engendered the most comment.

Before the meeting, I met at length with Dennis about Iran. I wanted to share his views, beyond those in his Washington Institute letter I have referenced before, because they may be useful in shaping Hillary's statement.

1. He felt that an agreement would be reached, would be disapproved by Congress, and the President's veto would be sustained, most likely in the House. Dennis later conveyed that view to the PM and Cabinet, provoking a strong reaction from Bibi.

2. The US should state clearly upfront that we will use all means at our disposal to prevent Iran from crossing the very fine line between being a nuclear capable state and being a nuclear weapons state. Iran must get a clear signal now.

3.The US should provide Israel with a new Mission Ordinance Penetration (MOP) bomb, that is more powerful than the Bunker Busting Bomb, and could blow-up the Fordo facility, if necessary. This would be a signal to Iran, that cheating will not pay.

4.The US should state it will support any action Israel must take for its own defense.

5. The US will not cooperate with Iran on regional issues.

6. If Hillary has to support what he believes will be a deeply flawed agrement, that will not measure-up to the April US Fact Sheet, these points above would be useful to state. In addition, she could balance support for opposing a new UN Resolution.

When I land. I will summarize the points I made about BDS.

I was struck in my week in Israel, not only among Israeli officials, but among my friends across the political spectrum (most are former officials) and apolitical relatives, at the depth of antipathy and distrust of President Obama, as "weak", "pro-Muslim", and "anti-Israel".

Best wishes,

Stu

When Americans look around the world today, we see one crisis after another. Russian aggression in Ukraine, extremism and chaos in Iraq and Syria, a deadly epidemic in West Africa, escalating territorial tensions in the East and South China seas, a global economy that still isn't producing enough growth or shared prosperity — the liberal international order that the United States has worked for generations to build and defend seems to be under pressure from every quarter. It's no wonder so many Americans express uncertainty and even fear about our role and our future in the world.

In his new book, "World Order," Henry Kissinger explains the historic scope of this challenge. His analysis, despite some differences over specific policies, largely fits with the broad strategy behind the Obama administration's effort over the past six years to build a global architecture of security and cooperation for the 21st century.

During the Cold War, America's bipartisan commitment to protecting and expanding a community of nations devoted to freedom, market economies and cooperation eventually proved successful for us and the world. Kissinger's summary of that vision sounds pertinent today: "an inexorably expanding cooperative order of states observing common rules and norms, embracing liberal economic systems, forswearing territorial conquest, respecting national sovereignty, and adopting participatory and democratic systems of governance."

This system, advanced by U.S. military and diplomatic power and our alliances with like-minded nations, helped us defeat fascism and communism and brought enormous benefits to Americans and billions of others. Nonetheless, many people around the world today — especially millions of young people — don't know these success stories, so it becomes our responsibility to show as well as tell what American leadership looks like.

This is especially important at a time when many are wondering, as Kissinger puts it, "Are we facing a period in which forces beyond the restraints of any order determine the future?"

For me, this is a familiar question. When I walked into the State Department in January 2009, everyone knew that it was a time of dizzying changes, but no one could agree on what they all meant. Would the economic crisis bring new forms of cooperation or a return to protectionism and discord? Would new technologies do more to help citizens hold leaders accountable or to help dictators keep tabs on dissidents? Would rising powers such as China, India and Brazil become global problem-solvers or global spoilers? Would the emerging influence of non-state actors be defined more by the threats from terrorist networks and criminal cartels, or by the contributions of courageous NGOs? Would growing global interdependence bring a new sense of solidarity or new sources of strife?

President Obama explained the overarching challenge we faced in his Nobel lecture in December 2009. After World War II, he said, "America led the world in constructing an architecture to keep the peace. . . . And yet, a decade into a new century, this old architecture is buckling under the weight of new threats."

I was proud to help the president begin reimagining and reinforcing the global order to meet the demands of an increasingly interdependent age. In the president's first term, we laid the foundation, from repaired alliances to updated international institutions to decisive action on challenges such as Iran's nuclear program and the threat from Osama bin Laden.

The crises of the second term underscore that this is a generational project that will demand a commitment from the United States and its partners for years to come. Kissinger writes that foreign policy is not "a story with a beginning and an end," but "a process of managing and tempering ever-recurring challenges." This calls to mind John F. Kennedy's observation that peace and progress are "based not on a sudden revolution in human nature but on a gradual evolution in human institutions . . . a process — a way of solving problems."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America, at its best, is a problem-solving nation. And our continued commitment to renovating and defending the global order will determine whether we build a future of peace, progress and prosperity in which people everywhere have the opportunity to live up to their God-given potential.

Much of “World Order” is devoted to exploring this challenge. It is vintage Kissinger, with his singular combination of breadth and acuity along with his knack for connecting headlines to trend lines — very long trend lines in this case. He ranges from the Peace of Westphalia to the pace of microprocessing, from Sun Tzu to Talleyrand to Twitter. He traces the Indian view of order back to the Hindu epics; the Muslim view to the campaigns of Muhammad; the European view to the carnage of the Thirty Years’ War (which elicits a comparison to the Middle East today); the Russian view to “the hard school of the steppe, where an array of nomadic hordes contended for resources on an open terrain with few fixed borders.” This long view can help us understand issues from Vladimir Putin’s aggression to Iran’s negotiating strategy, even as it raises the difficult question of “how divergent historic experiences and values can be shaped into a common order.”

Given today’s challenges, Kissinger’s analyses of the Asia-Pacific and the Middle East are particularly valuable.

When it comes to Asia, he notes that all of the region’s rising powers, China included, have their own visions of regional and global order, shaped by their own histories and present situations. How we contend with these divergent visions — building a cooperative relationship with China while preserving our other relationships, interests and values in a stable and prosperous region — will go a long way toward determining whether we can meet the broader global challenge.

In my book “Hard Choices,” I describe the strategy President Obama and I developed for the Asia-Pacific, centered on strengthening our traditional alliances; elevating and harmonizing the alphabet soup of regional organizations, such as ASEAN (the Association of Southeast Asian Nations) and APEC (the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation organization); and engaging China more broadly — both bilaterally, through new venues such as the Strategic and Economic Dialogue, and multilaterally, in settings where regional pressure would encourage more constructive behavior and shared decision-making on matters from freedom of navigation to climate change to trade to human rights. Our “pivot to Asia,” as it came to be known, is all about establishing a rules-based order in the region that can manage the peaceful rise of new powers and promote universal norms and values.

This kind of methodical, multilateral diplomacy is often slow and frustrating, rarely making headlines at home, but it can pay real dividends that affect the lives of millions of people. And without an effective regional order, the challenges multiply. Just look at the Middle East. “Nowhere,” Kissinger observes, “is the challenge of international order more complex — in terms of both organizing regional order and ensuring the compatibility of that order with peace and stability in the rest of the world.”

Kissinger is a friend, and I relied on his counsel when I served as secretary of state. He checked in with me regularly, sharing astute observations about foreign leaders and sending me written reports on his travels. Though we have often seen the world and some of our challenges quite differently, and advocated different responses now and in the past, what comes through clearly in this new book is a conviction that we, and President Obama, share: a belief in the indispensability of continued American leadership in service of a just and liberal order.

There really is no viable alternative. No other nation can bring together the necessary coalitions and provide the necessary capabilities to meet today’s complex global threats. But this leadership is not a birthright; it is a responsibility that must be assumed with determination and humility by each generation.

Fortunately, the United States is uniquely positioned to lead in the 21st century. It is not just because of the enduring strength of our military or the resilience of our economy, although both are absolutely essential. It goes deeper than that. The things that make us who we are as a nation — our diverse and open society, our devotion to human rights and democratic values — give us a singular advantage in building a future in which the forces of freedom and cooperation prevail over those of division, dictatorship and destruction.

This isn't just idealism. For an international order to take hold and last, Kissinger argues, it must relate "power to legitimacy." To that end, Kissinger, the famous realist, sounds surprisingly idealistic. Even when there are tensions between our values and other objectives, America, he reminds us, succeeds by standing up for our values, not shirking them, and leads by engaging peoples and societies, the sources of legitimacy, not governments alone. If our might helps secure the balance of power that underpins the international order, our values and principles help make it acceptable and attractive to others.

So our levers of leadership are not just about keeping our military strong and our diplomacy agile; they are about standing up for human rights, about advancing the rights and role of women and girls, about creating the space for a flourishing civil society and the conditions for broad-based development.

This strategic rationale guided my emphasis as secretary of state on using all the tools of foreign policy, even those sometimes dismissed as "soft." I called it "smart power," and I still believe it offers a blueprint for sustained American leadership in the decades ahead. We have to play to our strengths. And in an age when legitimacy is defined from the bottom up rather than the top down, America is better positioned than our more autocratic competitors.

Kissinger recognizes this as well. He understands how much the world has changed since his time in office, especially the diffusion of power and the growing influence of forces beyond national governments. International problems and solutions are increasingly centered, in ways both good and bad, on nongovernmental organizations, businesses and individual citizens. As a result, foreign policy is now as much about people as it is about states. Kissinger rightly notes that these shifts require a broader and deeper order than sufficed in the past. "Any system of world order, to be sustainable, must be accepted as just — not only by leaders, but also by citizens," he writes.

That is true abroad, and it is also true at home. Our country is at its best, and our leadership in the world is strongest, when we are united behind a common purpose and shared mission, and advancing shared prosperity and social justice at home. Sustaining America's leadership in the world depends on renewing the American dream for all our people.

In the past, we've flirted with isolationism and retreat, but always heeded the call to leadership when it was needed most. It's time for another of our great debates about what America means to the world and what the world means to America. We need to have an honest conversation together — all of us — about the costs and imperatives of global leadership, and what it really takes to keep our country safe and strong.

We have a lot to talk about. Sometimes we'll disagree. But that's what democracy is all about. A real national dialogue is the only way we're going to rebuild a political consensus to take on the perils and the promise of the 21st century. Henry Kissinger's book makes a compelling case for why we have to do it and how we can succeed.

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton calls out climate change deniers"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 4, 2014, 9:01 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton called out climate change “deniers” at a clean energy conference in Las Vegas Thursday evening, but revealed little new about what her own energy policy platform might look like if she decides to run for president.

Clinton began her remarks at the National Clean Energy Summit by laying out the problems climate change is already causing today, including extreme weather and droughts. “[These are] the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face,” she said. “No matter what deniers say.”

She went on to make an optimistic pitch for clean energy investment as a means to simultaneously create jobs, grow the environment, compete with China, and reduce greenhouse emissions.

“The threat is real, but so is the opportunity,” Clinton said. “America can be the clean energy superpower for the 21st century.”

During a question and answer session with Obama White House counselor John Podesta — who is a likely pick to lead Clinton’s potential presidential campaign, should she pursue that avenue — the former secretary of state took another swing at those who don’t see the benefits of green tech.

“Aside from the deniers and the special interests and all the other folks who want to pretend we don’t have a crisis is the fact that we are leaving money and jobs behind,” she said. “For those on the other side, they have to answer to the reality they are denying peoples’ jobs and middle class incomes and upward mobility by their refusal to look to the future.”

Clinton has several hard choices to make on what her energy policy will look like if she decides to run for president, but — not surprisingly — she left those decisions up in the air on Thursday.

With regards to natural gas, which has boomed in recent years, the former secretary of state said new fracking technologies can be part of the solution, even though they present their own problems. “We have to face head-on the legitimate, pressing environmental concerns,” she said.

Whoever runs for the Democratic nomination can expect to face pressure from environmentalists to crack down on fracking. But Clinton simply repeated almost verbatim the position she lays out in her book, “Hard Choices,” calling for “smart regulations” which may include “deciding not to drill when the risks are too high.”

Also, as expected, she did not mention the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.

In her remarks, Clinton noted that the clean energy future she envisions is not “some kind of a dream,” pointing to Nevada as an exemplar. Just today, the electric car manufacturer Telsa announced it had selected the state for a massive new battery factory that will be powered by wind and solar energy, she noted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton touted other states' work as well, including Iowa, perhaps raising a few eyebrows since that state hosts the first major primary events for the presidential elections. "This is a reality that can be brought to scale," she said.

On climate regulations, Clinton praised Obamas' use of executive authority through the Environmental Protection Agency to reduce greenhouse gasses, but said more needs to be done. "Now we have to step up and build on that success," she said.

Clinton was introduced by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, who hosts the conference and praised Clinton as someone who "understands climate change — she was first to identify the fact that there is something called climate change." Reid noted that in addition to her public work, he appreciated Clinton's loyalty to his son, who volunteered on the then-senator's 2008 presidential campaign.

"I have great affection for this woman," he added. "I watch her in action — she's the best."

Politico: "John Podesta eyed for Hillary Clinton campaign chair"

By Maggie Haberman

September 4, 2014, 6:16 p.m. EDT

In late July, members of an informal group of people who've been meeting to plan outside assistance to a potential Hillary Clinton campaign gathered at the M Street offices of the Messina Group in Washington, D.C. At the table was one new and very notable attendee — John Podesta, counselor to President Barack Obama and a longtime Clinton confidant.

In more than 20 interviews, Podesta was mentioned repeatedly as the person most likely to take on the role of campaign chairman — or chief executive officer or another top role, depending on how a potential campaign would be structured — if Clinton runs in 2016. The interest in Podesta is a reflection of both Clintons' comfort and familiarity with him, but also of his standing among progressive voters with whom Clinton has had a sometimes-strained relationship.

White House aides would not comment. One administration official said that what staffers do in their private time is their own concern. And Podesta declined through White House aides to address discussions about him and a future campaign.

In late 2013, Podesta was in discussions to become a co-chair of Priorities USA, someone who could help blend the worlds of Obama, represented by Jim Messina as the super PAC's co-chair, and Clinton. The super PAC backed Obama in 2012 and has morphed into a pro-Clinton entity. Instead, he went to the White House. Podesta said he would stay for a year, and he has privately told people he plans to stick to that time frame.

Podesta's presence at the July 28 meeting, confirmed by several sources, underscores the likelihood that the veteran of the Clinton White House and founder of the liberal think tank Center for American Progress appears interested in playing a major role in a 2016 campaign if Clinton runs. And it came as Priorities and the other outside groups are increasingly turning attention to their plans for 2015. At a different working-group meeting several weeks ago, for instance, attendees intimated that Priorities is prepared to spend money to defend Clinton in a primary. At the moment, Priorities is searching for a finance director, several sources said.

Podesta founded CAP years ago and has deep credibility with a group of voters with which Clinton has at times had strained relations. He is not a Washington outsider, but he is a highly respected figure in the party who could draw clear lanes of authority in a campaign, something that was lacking in Clinton's last bid.

Several sources familiar with the 2008 campaign said Clinton had wanted Podesta to play a role in that race, but he had little interest in getting involved in the dysfunctional set-up.

Sources familiar with her advisers' current discussions say there have been conversations about Podesta in a top role.

The two names most discussed for campaign manager or some type of senior role are Robby Mook, a respected operative who is currently advising Clinton's team for the 2014 midterms, according to people familiar with his involvement; and Guy Cecil, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee executive director who is well-liked by Bill Clinton and has ties to some of Hillary Clinton's advisers. Both are veterans of her 2008 campaign have strong cheering sections among Clinton insiders.

Installing Podesta, who is not known as a warm and fuzzy figure, in a chairman role would mark a departure from the way the position was cast in 2008. The chairman of that campaign was Terry McAuliffe, the current Virginia governor who was a cheerleader and a prolific fundraiser.

With Podesta in the role, the campaign chair would involve a more operational role, with someone who has run organizations and for whom many people currently in Washington have worked at one point or another. He also has the ability, as several sources put it, to be blunt with the candidate.

The other person frequently mentioned by political watchers outside of Clinton's orbit as a campaign chairman is Tom Nides, a top Clinton deputy from her State Department days and current executive at Morgan Stanley. He's among the few people seen as having the right stature for a top job. Yet while Nides is well respected within Clinton's orbit and by big donors — and would likely play a major role in a campaign — he was described by several people as less of a fit for chairman. That's partly because the job would be deeply disruptive to his life in a way it wouldn't be for Podesta.

The chatter about who will fill a second Clinton campaign has been one of Washington's and New York's favorite political parlor games since shortly after she left the State Department. Still, there has been little discussion internally about how key jobs will be filled, and few new names have emerged since Clinton departed Foggy Bottom. Her current, slender staff would need to grow substantially, but those currently there are all likely to play significant roles.

Process stories around 2016 staffing have irked Clinton loyalists for months, in part because of the fantasy-baseball league nature of speculation from corners of the political world that often don't have insight into her thinking for a campaign that doesn't exist. Lots of input has been offered about a future campaign, but not all of it is solicited. Clinton allies also insist she has not yet made up her mind, and shouldn't be held captive to the impression that an organizational train is leaving the station and she needs to get on board because it's too far along to stop it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are no clear candidates who are being discussed for polling, ads or communications director, a critical job for a potential candidate whose relationship with the media has long been a sore point.

Philippe Reines, her longtime adviser and spokesman, will have as much of a role as he wants in a campaign, according to several sources. But he's told friends that he's preferred moving into a larger strategic role in recent years, in part because he no longer has interest in the daily media grind.

Minyon Moore, a longtime Clinton adviser, will likely continue to advise Clinton in some way, as she has since Clinton left State, several people said. Cheryl Mills and Huma Abedin will be highly involved. Clinton's former State Department adviser Jake Sullivan is expected to play a key part on policy. Dan Schwerin, another adviser, is also expected to have a role.

Most of Clinton's top advisers from 2008 have said they don't have an interest in returning. Neera Tanden, the current president of CAP and a longtime Clinton adviser dating to her White House days and who worked on the 2008 campaign, is seen as one of her party's best policy minds, and an asset who could play a key role as an informal outside adviser from where she sits.

Kiki McLean, who has been close to the Clintons for decades and who directed surrogate operations around the release of her latest book, "Hard Choices," would also likely be involved as a consultant.

Ace Smith, a veteran California operative who has been mentioned in reports as a potential adviser, is also in good standing among Clinton advisers.

Finance chairs and directors have also been a focus of speculation. Jonathan Mantz, who worked on her 2008 campaign and is a finance consultant to Priorities, has been mentioned as a potential hire for her campaign. The person seen as the likeliest to have a major finance role is Dennis Cheng, who is currently the main fundraiser at her family's foundation.

There have been two other names mentioned for finance jobs: Michael Pratt, who was Elizabeth Warren's finance director and is currently working with Iowa Senate hopeful Bruce Braley, and Jordan Kaplan, the main fundraiser for the Democratic National Committee who has won praise for his work there.

As for pollsters, Clinton will have her pick. Several people have suggested Geoff Garin, who worked on her last campaign and is widely respected, as a top prospect. So is Joel Benenson, Obama's pollster and a veteran of two successful national races. Another name that's been mentioned has been Anna Greenberg, who helped engineer Bill de Blasio's successful mayoral run in New York City last year.

It is unclear what will happen, meanwhile, with the outside groups that have been working in support of her. Ready for Hillary, the low-dollar super PAC that a handful of former Clinton insiders formed soon after the 2012 election, has had success generating positive media and has built a millions-strong email list and voter-contact base. Some of its boosters hope elements will be incorporated into a campaign, but that's not a forgone conclusion.

It's also unclear what will happen to Correct the Record, which has defended Clinton when Republicans attack her on the Benghazi attacks and other issues. It is helmed by Burns Strider, another 2008 veteran and a Hillary Clinton favorite.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The flurry of outside-group activity has long given the false impression of a turn-key operation. Insiders insist there is no grand political plan or need right now for a political master strategist. That's not because her team lacks competent members but because she's not running for anything yet, and her focus has primarily been on selling her book.

Many people have passed along suggestions about politics to Clinton's team or had conversations about the general lay of the land. Michael Whouley, who has a relationship dating to 1992 with the Clintons and who, along with Moore and two other Dewey Square officials, gave Hillary Clinton a presentation at her Washington home last year about running for president, has had informal discussions about politics related to 2016.

"He has not been asked for recommendations and he has not made any recommendations for 2016 staffing," said Dewey Square spokeswoman Ginny Terzano. "Michael has over three decades worth of political experience and regularly gets calls from campaigns asking for good staff recommendations for this cycle (2014) that has nothing to do with 2016."

While most observers and allies believe Clinton will ultimately run, people close to her insist she has not yet made up her mind. Nothing has happened externally that would make running more difficult for her — no one other than Warren has caught fire among progressives, and she has repeatedly insisted she is not running.

That gives Clinton wide running room to make decisions. But she's made clear she wants an expanded team and new blood if she runs, and she'll face the challenge of accommodating all the people who have long relationships with her but who may not have an obvious role.

Politico: "Clinton reviews Kissinger book"

By Lucy McCalmont

September 4, 2014, 6:12 p.m. EDT

First Lady. Senator. Secretary of State. Possible 2016 contender. Book critic?

Hillary Clinton weighed in on Henry Kissinger's latest book "World Order," for the Washington Post, in a review published by the paper Thursday.

"Though we have often seen the world and some of our challenges quite differently, and advocated different responses now and in the past, what comes through clearly in this new book is a conviction that we, and President Obama, share: a belief in the indispensability of continued American leadership in service of a just and liberal order," Clinton writes.

However, Clinton's review of the book, which she calls "vintage Kissinger," discusses larger issues of U.S. foreign policy, including that of the Obama administration and her own experience at the State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton adds that Kissinger's "long view" and analyses are "particularly valuable" to determining America's role on the international stage and its diplomatic goals.

"For an international order to take hold and last, Kissinger argues, it must relate 'power to legitimacy.' To that end, Kissinger, the famous realist, sounds surprisingly idealistic," Clinton writes. "Even when there are tensions between our values and other objectives, America, he reminds us, succeeds by standing up for our values, not shirking them, and leads by engaging peoples and societies, the sources of legitimacy, not governments alone."

Clinton, whose memoir "Hard Choices" was released earlier this year, has also written the foreword for New York Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand's forthcoming book "Off the Sidelines."

The Hill: "Clinton: 'US can still do big things'"

By Laura Barron-Lopez

September 4, 2014, 7:52 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Thursday said action on climate change and renewable energy will send a signal that the "U.S. can still do big things".

The likely 2016 Democratic front-runner, drove a hard line on the need to pursue clean energy sources to help mitigate climate change and spur economic growth, asserting that the U.S. can become the "clean energy superpower our world needs."

"[Climate change] is the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and world," Clinton said at the National Clean Energy Summit 7.0 in Nevada on Thursday. "The data is unforgiving no matter what the deniers try to assert."

"Sea levels are rising, ice caps are melting, storms and wildfires are wreaking havoc…but if we come together to make the hard choices America can be the clean energy superpower of the 21st century," she added to applause.

Clinton fired back at arguments by climate skeptics, and Republicans who say the U.S. should not put its neck out on climate change when other nations do little.

If the U.S. doesn't lead, no one will, she said, adding that she of all people knows what it takes to mobilize leaders internationally.

"This is about our strategic position in the world, this is about our competitiveness our job creation, our economic growth as well as dealing with a challenge that we ignore at our detriment and our peril," Clinton said.

Focusing on wind, solar, and other renewables, Clinton called for investments as a means to help raise U.S. families into the middle class faster than traditional energy sources.

Clean energy jobs "tend to pay higher than average wages," Clinton explained.

Flipping the GOP script that acting on climate is unsustainable, and will kill jobs, Clinton said: "For those on the other side they have to answer to the reality they are denying peoples' jobs, and middle class incomes, and upward mobility by there refusal to look to the future."

The former first lady did touch on the natural gas boom, repeating excerpts from her book, Hard Choices, when saying gas will be key as a "bridge" to cleaner sources, but "smart regulations" and "not drilling when the risks are too high" will be necessary.

Clinton made no mention of the Keystone XL pipeline, which green groups have pressured her on in recent months.

CNN: "Clinton: Republicans are denying the United States clean energy jobs"

By Dan Merica

September 4, 2014, 8:57 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton used a softball climate change question on Thursday to step up her political rhetoric and hit Republicans for "denying people jobs and middle-class incomes."

The answer was telling because Clinton turned a benign, nonpartisan question into a political talking point, something that months ago she would likely not have done.

"The hardest part for me of this whole false choice debate that has gone on too long is that aside from the deniers and the folks who want to pretend that we don't have a crisis is the fact that we are leaving money and jobs behind," Clinton said at the Clean Energy Summit 7.0, describing the choice between investing in clean energy and growing the American economy.

Clinton added: "For those on the other side, they have to answer to the reality they are denying people jobs and middle-class incomes and upward mobility by their refusal to look to the future."

For months, Clinton has crisscrossed the country as part of her time on the speaking circuit and on her book tour. The former secretary of state is widely seen as the front-runner to be the Democrat's presidential nominee in 2016 and, although she has not announced she is running, she has admitted she is thinking about it and will likely make a decision at the start of 2015.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As that decision date moves closer, Clinton appears to be getting more comfortable with giving political answers. She has also stepped up her political schedule, with events with a cadre of Democratic groups in September.

Clinton also weighed in on hydraulic fracturing, a controversial method of extracting oil.

The former first lady called concerns over fracturing legitimate and pressing. She added that in light of the practice, "it is crucial that we put in place smart regulations and enforce them, including deciding not to drill when the risks are too high."

The answer was similar to what Clinton writes in her memoir "Hard Choices."

Clinton was being interviewed by John Podesta on Thursday. Podesta, a former chief of staff for Bill Clinton who now works for President Barack Obama, attended a meeting of Democratic operatives in late July and, according to Politico, is being eyed as Clinton's likely campaign chairman in 2016.

His response to her political answer: "That is great. And I think we need to keep repeating that argument."

National Journal: “Clinton: America Can Be Clean-Energy 'Superpower'”

By Jason Plautz

September 4, 2014

The U.S. can become the "clean energy superpower of the 21st Century," Hillary Clinton said Thursday, urging businesses and the government to build up the renewable sector.

"Climate change is the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face," the former secretary of state and likely 2016 Democratic frontrunner said Thursday at Harry Reid's annual energy conference in Las Vegas. "The threat is real and so is the opportunity … if we make the hard choices."

As expected, Clinton's keynote address at the National Clean Energy Summit didn't wade into much controversial territory. She offered support for President Obama's climate action plan and EPA rules that will regulate power plant emissions and didn't delve into too many specifics of what a Clinton energy agenda might look like.

Instead, she talked up the opportunities for international climate agreements and the growth of the clean energy economy at home. She chastised the "false choice debate" between the environment and the economy, saying that with the right tax incentives and policies to foster growth, there was great potential for renewables. She specifically mentioned energy efficiency retrofits for buildings -- a hallmark of the Clinton Climate Initiative -- as "the most overlooked opportunity in our country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It wasn't all tried-and-true fodder for greens. Clinton did put her weight behind the natural gas boom that has divided environmentalists, saying that the fuel offered environmental and economic payoffs with the right safeguards in place, a position she's taken in the past.

Specifically, she said, drillers needed to regulate leaks of methane, the potent greenhouse gas that is more powerful than carbon dioxide. She called for "smart regulations" to keep drilling safe, including "not to drill when the risks are too high."

She also didn't mention the Keystone XL pipeline, nor did it come up in a question-and-answer session with White House counselor John Podesta (who Politico reported is rumored to be the top choice for Clinton's campaign chairman), although greens have been clamoring to hear her position on the controversial tar sands project.

A large part of Clinton's speech focused on foreign policy, including the need to secure a strong international agreement to combat climate change. Clinton dedicated a chapter of her State Department memoir Hard Choices to her work at the U.N. climate conference in Copenhagen and again reiterated her call for a "strong agreement, applicable to all."

The odds of such an agreement, she said, were boosted by Obama's climate action plan, which she said would "show the world we are serious about meeting our obligations and show ... the U.S. can still do big things," putting the government in a position of leadership.

Clinton also came down hard on Russian president Vladimir Putin, saying again that she'd like to see European countries diversify their energy supply to become less reliant on Russian oil. Clinton made a trip to Ukraine as Secretary of State to discuss energy independence, but said there seems to be less movement in that direction than she'd like.

"If there's a sea change, it's at low tide," she said. "It hasn't quite got the momentum that I would like to see, but at least the conversation is much more serious."

Overall, Clinton said, the work being done in the U.S. to combat climate change needed to continue accelerating to ensure that the country would continue to lead on the world's stage.

"We cannot afford to cede leadership in this area," she said. "Our economic recovery, our efforts against climate change, our strategic position in the world all will improve if we can build a safe bridge to a clean energy economy."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: “Hillary Clinton’s vacation is definitely over”

By Sebastian Payne

September 5, 2014, 6:30 a.m. EDT

Summer vacation is over for Hillary Rodham Clinton. The former secretary of state spent most of the past few weeks plugging her latest book and going light on politically-inclined appearances. But post-Labor Day, Clinton is back at work with a jam-packed schedule -- an itinerary heavy on potentially campaign-aiding stops, including policy talks, foreign trips, outreach to key Democratic constituencies, and visits to key early-voting states.

Here's what she's up to:

Thinking globally. On Wednesday, Clinton made her first visit to the State Department since leaving in 2013, gathering with five former and present secretaries of state to break ground at the new United States Diplomacy Center. "We all know that we will never do anything more challenging in our lives than to serve these objectives," said Henry Kissinger. "I would say all of us, except one."

On Thursday, Clinton herself weighed in on Kissinger, reviewing his new book "World Order" for The Washington Post's Book World. She got in a nod to her own book "Hard Choices" in her laudatory assessment of his take on the situation in the Middle East and Asia.

That wasn't her last internationally-minded trip of the week. On Friday, Clinton was headed to Mexico to speak at an event for Carlos Slim's Helu Foundation. Notably, fellow 2016 candidate Chris Christie also went to Mexico this week to build up his international cred.

Paying her respects locally. On Sept. 16, Clinton is slated to headline a fundraiser for an organization that works to aid 9/11 victims, families, and first responders -- no doubt a reminder to some of her record, as a New York senator, of backing programs to aid those groups.

Spotlighting policy. On Thursday, Clinton sat down with progressive favorite John Podesta at a clean-energy conference in Las Vegas. Later this month, she'll be a heavy presence at the Clinton Global Initiative's 10th anniversary summit, where world leaders and policy heavyweights are expected to take the stage.

Building base cred. On Tuesday 9th, Clinton is hosting a fundraiser for the Democratic Women's Senate Network at her home in Washington, with tickets starting at $10,000. A little more than a week later, she'll again make a plug for the political fortunes of Democratic women, speaking at the DNC's Women's Leadership Forum in Washington, DC.

Putting in face time in major primary states. On Sept. 14, both Bill and Hillary Clinton are slated to attend Sen. Tom Harkin's (D-Iowa) final annual steak fry in Iowa — marking her first visit to that vital early-voting state since her loss there in the 2008 caucuses.

Politico: "Bill Clinton and Charlie Crist: The odd couple"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Maggie Haberman

September 5, 2014, 5:04 a.m. EDT

While everyone's focused on Hillary Clinton's next potential campaign, it's Bill Clinton who's been racking up frequent-flier miles, trying to get Democrats elected in the midterms.

He's crisscrossed the country in the past eight months, doing more than 20 events for Democratic hopefuls from Florida to Kentucky to Rhode Island as the party's most sought-after surrogate and rainmaker. In some cases, he's gone to bat for candidates who supported his wife six years ago; in others, he's gotten behind contenders who have long relationships with the former first couple. And the former Arkansas chief has an obvious soft spot for governors, a group that has received little attention from the current president.

At a campaign rally in Miami Friday, Clinton will test the strength of a relatively new relationship, with Charlie Crist, the Republican-turned-Democrat who's running for his old job as Florida's governor. Crist was once a harsh Clinton critic, denouncing him during the impeachment scandal in the late 1990s — a fact state Republicans have been quick to resurrect.

But now, as his wife is eyeing another national campaign, the perennial battleground of Florida looms potentially large for the Clintons. And Bill Clinton and Crist have developed a rapport, speaking a number of times since Crist launched his candidacy, multiple sources familiar with the conversations told POLITICO. Clinton, a famous dispenser of campaign advice with an eye for the granular in a race, has occasionally chewed over Crist's own bid against GOP Gov. Rick Scott.

"Whoever wins Florida is the next president of the United States," said John Morgan, a major Democratic donor whose law firm employs Crist. "That's just math."

The governor is "extremely important," Morgan added. "They control the secretary of state, voting days, voting hours."

It wasn't until Crist won his primary last week against Nan Rich that Clinton was able to formally back him. Rich was a supporter of Hillary Clinton, Morgan noted, and now that Crist is the nominee "I think [Clinton's] hands are untied."

Clinton and Crist had their first real dealings in 2010, when Crist was running for the U.S. Senate as an independent. His advisers sought help from Bill Clinton to get the Democrat, Rep. Kendrick Meek, a longtime Clinton ally, to drop out of the race and thwart then-state Sen. Marco Rubio from winning. Clinton tried, but Meek stayed in and Rubio won. Still, it established some level of political discussion between the Clinton and Crist camps.

The appearance with Crist will cap a week of campaigning for Democratic gubernatorial candidates by Clinton. Earlier, he attended events for Connecticut Gov. Daniel Malloy and Maine candidate Mike Michaud. While in Maine, he stopped by Kennebunkport to pay a visit to former President George H.W. Bush, with whom he has forged a bond since working with him on post-Hurricane Katrina relief.

Clinton will attend a fundraiser on Saturday for embattled Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu and another one the following weekend for Georgia Democratic Senate hopeful Michelle Nunn.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former president did an ad for Rhode Island treasurer candidate Seth Magaziner, the son of Clinton's longtime adviser Ira Magaziner. He is doing a direct mail piece for Nina Turner's secretary of state race in Ohio, another key presidential proving ground.

Clinton's team prefers to let campaigns he helps announce the visits as they see fit. That typically means as much local exposure as possible to move voters but little attention in the national media, meaning some events slip under the Beltway radar.

This month, Clinton will also host a fundraiser for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, before joining his wife in Iowa for the final Sen. Tom Harkin Steak Fry in Indianola. Clinton's appeal is global in a way that few other surrogates' is, a far cry from 2010, when the White House asked him for surgical help in a brutal midterms cycle.

This time around, it's President Barack Obama whom many campaigns are steering clear of, and Bill Clinton who is in high demand.

"I'd like to think these are just previews to a robust schedule over the next eight weeks," said DCCC Chairman Steve Israel, saying there are 70 House districts in which either Clinton could be a huge help.

At the same time, Bill and Hillary Clinton are expecting a grandchild, which will most likely affect their political schedule.

"I would imagine … that if the baby is born before the election, he or she will also be in great demand in these districts," Israel joked. "I do not imagine that grandma and grandpa will allow that to happen, however."

Bill Clinton's focus has been both future-looking but also personal. He is deeply invested in races in Arkansas, talking frequently with people there about how Democratic Sen. Mark Pryor and gubernatorial hopeful Mike Ross are faring.

Clinton is known for being difficult to control as a principal, with a deep love for campaigning and a willingness to stop in front of a waiting microphone even as aides try to shove him along. But despite that free-wheeling aspect to his political approach, his allies believe the perception that he is quick to go off-message is unfair.

"There are two politicians who are best at staying on-message and sticking to the script, and that's Bill Clinton and Jeanne Shaheen," said Terry Shumaker, a co-chair of Clinton's 1992 and 1996 campaigns in New Hampshire.

"When he campaigns for other candidates, it comes across as very sincere and also genuine — he's also knowledgeable about issues in an election which a lot of surrogates frankly aren't," he added. "He just connects with people in a way that I've never seen any other politician do."

The New Republic: “President Clinton to Keynote The New Republic’s Centennial Gala”

[No Writer Mentioned]

September 4, 2014

The New Republic announced today that President Bill Clinton will deliver the keynote address at the magazine’s centennial gala on Wednesday, November 19 at the Andrew W. Mellon Auditorium in Washington, DC. The black-tie event will also include a performance by world-renowned jazz musician, Wynton Marsalis. "The New Republic was created to shape the course of American life—and in the course of one hundred years, we've become an American institution,” said Franklin Foer, editor of The New Republic. “Our history has made a meaningful difference in public life and is worthy of tribute—and a big party!"

Madeleine Albright, Christiane Amanpour, Drew Faust, Richard Plepler, Peter Sarsgaard, Joe Scarborough, Aaron Sorkin, George Stephanopoulos, and Fareed Zakaria will join the celebration as co-hosts.

In addition to the gala, to commemorate its one hundredth year, The New Republic will release an anthology on September 16 and an anniversary issue on November 10. Insurrections of the Mind: 100-Years of Politics and Culture in America, edited by Foer and published by HarperCollins, is a collection of more than 50 of the magazine’s most seminal essays from the past century. Foer, Chris Hughes, and other editors will give book talks across the country throughout the fall.

The anniversary issue aims to be the best issue of The New Republic yet. Double in size, it will feature pieces by Jonathan Chait, Hendrik Hertzberg, Michael Lewis, Alec MacGillis, Martha Nussbaum, Hanna Rosin, Noam Scheiber, Judith Shulevitz, Jason Zengerle, and others. The anniversary issue will pay tribute to the magazine’s history, but the focus will be on the next American century and topics that will drive the conversation for the next 100 years.

Over the next three months, readers will notice digital features highlighting the anniversary, including 100 Year 100 Stories, a selection of 100 notable stories from the archives featured daily on newrepublic.com . The New Republic kicks off the celebration today by unveiling its 100-year logo.

“From the gala to the special issue, celebrating our centennial this fall is just as much about envisioning the future of the institution as it is about honoring its storied history,” said Chris Hughes, owner of The New Republic. “The New Republic has had the privilege of contributing to the national discourse for the past 100 years and we are eager to contribute to the next 100 as well.”

The New Republic celebrates its one hundredth with the help of Credit Suisse, a centennial sponsor, and Diageo, a gala sponsor.

News and Observer blog: Under the Dome: “Bill Clinton coming to Chapel Hill for Hagan”

By Mary Cornatzer

September 4, 2014

Back in March, Dome asked whether former President Bill Clinton would help Sen. Kay Hagan's campaign. We're about to find out.

Clinton is the special guest at a Sept. 30 luncheon for Hagan in Chapel Hill.

Clinton has been much in demand on the campaign circuit, particularly in red states. This month he's also scheduled for Louisiana (Sen. Mary Landrieu) and Georgia (Michelle Nunn).

Dome must point out that while Clinton is widely popular in the South – throngs came out to see him in North Carolina when he campaigned for his wife in 2008 – he did not carry the state during either of his two presidential victories.

Washington Post Magazine: "The Gillibrand mystique: Is memoir a step along presidential pathway?"

By Luisita Lopez Torregrosa

September 4, 2014, 6:17 p.m. EDT

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand is sitting at a corner table in the Senate dining room, eating a salad and ducking questions about her political ambitions, when she spots fellow Democrat Elizabeth Warren walking in. Minutes later, Gillibrand has ushered her interviewer to meet the Massachusetts senator. The two women, who are frequently mentioned as possible backups to Hillary Clinton for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, cheerfully trade pleasantries and compliments.

"She's great," Gillibrand says.

"She's really amazing," Warren says.

Though brief, the exchange captures Gillibrand's political skill, as she seizes on an opportunity to make a reporter feel like an insider and, at the same time, showcases cordial relations with a colleague others are casting as a potential rival.

Telegenic and brainy, the 47-year-old junior senator from New York and mother of two has become a visible face in the Senate, a regular at women's forums and policy talk shows, and something of a political pinup (The Hill named her one of its 50 most beautiful in 2010). An obscure second-term House member when appointed to fill Clinton's seat in 2009, she has won election and reelection, both by landslides.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If Hillary Clinton doesn’t run in 2016, I wouldn’t be surprised to see Kirsten Gillibrand jump in,” says Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. “Gillibrand seems to have the ambition to do it.”

In her sixth year in the Senate, working out of Clinton’s former quarters in the Russell Senate Office Building, Gillibrand has carved out territory including military and middle-class issues, and fashioned an image as a tenacious fighter for women. Now, she has taken another step along the modern-day passage to the presidency: writing a political memoir. With an introduction by Clinton, “Off the Sidelines: Raise Your Voice, Change the World” is due out Sept. 9. Like Gillibrand’s political action committee of the same name, it exhorts women to take the lead in politics, in business and at home. “I wrote the book to encourage women to use their voices,’’ she says.

Gillibrand says she’s “worried that the women’s movement is dead.” Acknowledging that some feminist leaders might find that characterization inflammatory, she says, “I think those of us who are in the trenches recognize we’re in a tough place.” While citing achievements such as keeping abortion-rights efforts alive and helping women advance in the workforce, she contends that “there’s no functional movement where we’re working together and making sure all women are heard on all these issues.”

With “Off the Sidelines,” she says, “I’m creating a call to … create the women’s movement we need for this generation.”

The title is “perfect for her, since she is not on the sidelines one minute of her life,” says Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.), Gillibrand’s close friend and softball team co-captain.

So, to continue the analogy, the question becomes this: If Gillibrand is off the sidelines, where is she going? Is she headed for the quarterback position? Is she running for president?

“I would say that I’m supporting Hillary in 2016,” the senator says, “and I am going to fight very hard to see that she wins.”

And if Clinton doesn’t run?

Gillibrand shrugs.

Political books serve different purposes: campaign tools, ego boosters, policy tracts, coming-of-age reminiscences. Gillibrand’s has a bit of each. It tells the story of Kirsten Elizabeth Rutnik, a middle-class Roman Catholic Albany schoolgirl who was driven to excel and influenced by a line of strong-willed, iconoclastic women who cared little about public opinion.

Her maternal great-grandmother, Mimi, an Irish immigrant, worked at an ammunition arsenal during World War II, kicked her husband out of the house for drinking too much and chose to raise her children alone. Mimi’s daughter, Kirsten’s grandmother, Dorothea “Polly” McLean Noonan became a prominent figure in Albany and an intimate of longtime mayor Erastus Corning. Salty-tongued and brazen, she was a leader of the Albany Democratic Party machine, doling out patronage and favors, organizing government secretaries known as “Polly’s Girls,” and heading the Albany Democratic Women’s Club.

Kirsten (everyone called her Tina) learned campaign basics from her grandmother, stuffing envelopes, sticking bumper stickers on cars, handing out fliers and knocking on doors. “I really wanted to follow my grandmother into politics,” she says, “and I liked how assured she was, and I liked that she was passionate about what she did.”

Kirsten’s mother, also named Polly, founded a law firm in Albany with her husband, Douglas P. Rutnik. Polly Rutnik ran the home as well as practicing law. She cooked, did most of the housework, looked after her three children, Douglas, Kirsten and Erin, and found time to earn a black belt in karate and hunt turkeys for Thanksgiving. “She prioritized both work and family; I never imagined I would do otherwise,” Gillibrand writes in the book. (Kirsten’s parents divorced when she was 22.)

Kirsten learned to cope with stress and competition on the tennis court, and learned to argue at home, with her father. “I fought about everything,” she says. “Can I go to a party? Can I go to a concert?” He called her Foghorn and Loudmouth.

Despite standing up to her father, “I was a massive kiss-[a--] and lived for positive reinforcement,” she writes in her book. “As a child, I wrote in perfect cursive penmanship, thanks to the nuns. I did all my homework as soon as I got home, and I kept my room clean.” She was a goody-two-shoes, except for her temper and her elbows-out determination to excel. “Whatever I did — debating, playing the piano or tennis, selling Girl Scout cookies — I had to earn a gold star. ”

She went to Catholic schools from kindergarten to middle school and attended Emma Willard, an elite all-girls high school. At Dartmouth, she ignored campus politics, joined a sorority, majored in Asian studies (spending a semester in Beijing, where her roommate was Connie Britton of TV’s “Nashville,” who remains a friend) and graduated magna cum laude.Only after earning a degree at the UCLA School of Law and landing a job at the international law firm Davis Polk & Wardwell in New York City did Gillibrand get involved in politics.

“The voice that inspired me to take my life in a new direction came in a pink suit,” she writes. On Sept. 5, 1995, first lady Hillary Clinton spoke in Beijing at the Fourth World Conference on Women, forging the phrase that became a mantra for women worldwide: Human rights are women’s rights and women’s rights are human rights. Hearing about the speech made Gillibrand wish she had been there and had been part of the conversation. And it brought back her childhood dream of being in politics, like her grandmother.

Shortly afterward, Gillibrand heard Clinton speak at the Women’s Leadership Forum in New York, which she joined. “That’s what got me into the nuts and bolts of New York City politics,” Gillibrand says. In 1996, she was an unpaid fundraiser in President Bill Clinton’s reelection campaign and, four years later, volunteered to raise money for Vice President Al Gore. After Gore’s defeat, she went to work at Boies, Schiller & Flexner — whose star attorney, David Boies, had represented Gore in Bush v. Gore — and was made partner, earning about $450,000 a year.

She kept her hand in politics, fundraising for Hillary Clinton’s senatorial campaign and training to run for office herself, moving to her firm’s Albany office so she could vie for a congressional seat close to her Upstate roots. In 2006, she ran for the conservative 20th Congressional District against a popular Republican.

She proved to be a tireless campaigner and prolific fundraiser, amassing $4.6 million, a stunning sum for a congressional campaign. Her opponent, Rep. John E. Sweeney, who portrayed her as an out-of-touch, rich Manhattanite, was leading in the polls. But shortly before Election Day, a police report was leaked to newspapers saying that Sweeney’s wife had called 911 to say he was beating her. His camp said Gillibrand leaked the report; she declined to say. She won by 6 points.

Despite that upset, Gillibrand was unknown in much of New York when Gov. David A. Paterson appointed her to fill Clinton's Senate term in a controversial move seen as a nod to her gender and Upstate support. It didn't help that she had been the second choice, after Caroline Kennedy, yet ahead of more experienced representatives. Gillibrand was sworn in on Jan. 27, 2009, at 42 then the youngest member of the U.S. Senate.

From the start she ran into a wall. Some colleagues and newspaper columnists called her Tracy Flick, referring to the blond, ambitious Reese Witherspoon character in the film "Election." Some older congressmen poked at her weight. "Don't lose too much weight now. I like my girls chubby," said one.

In New York City's liberal circles, her 15 years as a highly paid corporate lawyer and two years representing a conservative district didn't sit well. She was seen as a political lightweight and labeled pro-gun, pro-Wall Street, anti-immigration and pro-tobacco. (During the tobacco wars of the 1990s, she had helped represent Altria, parent company of Philip Morris.) Enlisting supporters like the Clintons, she countered with a campaign to win over blacks, Hispanics and other liberals. She won election to a Senate term in 2010, 63 to 35 percent, then reelection two years ago, 72to 26 percent.

Along with broadening her electoral base, Gillibrand has come to be associated with several high-profile issues. She was a leader in the successful struggle to repeal "don't ask, don't tell." She was on the front lines of the campaign to gain approval of marriage equality in the New York legislature, and was among the first Democrats to call for bringing combat troops home from Afghanistan. To address the plight of low- and middle-income families, she has fashioned an ambitious agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, affordable day care and universal pre-K education. She established Off the Sidelines as a PAC in 2011 and raised $1 million for female candidates in the 2012 cycle. Her goal is to double that for the midterms this year, and she says she is close to doing it.

Another issue she has focused on: sexual abuses in the armed forces. She waged a yearlong battle for her bill to strip commanders of their authority to prosecute those cases and give that responsibility to military lawyers outside the chain of command. Military leaders opposed the measure, and in March, her proposal came up five votes short of the 60 needed to advance to the Senate floor. Sen. Claire McCaskill of Missouri, a Democrat, led the fight to block it, offering bipartisan reforms that kept prosecution within the chain of command.

"I was devastated," Gillibrand says.

"She is formidable," says McCaskill, who is now working with Gillibrand on legislation to curb sexual assaults on university campuses. "She doesn't stop. She lobbies every senator over and over. I tell people, 'If you are going to oppose Kirsten Gillibrand, you need to pack your lunch, because you won't have time to go out.' "

Hill watchers often cite Gillibrand's political appeal. "She has impressively emerged from the paralyzed muck of the U.S. Senate because she offers a progressive vision," says Steve Clemons, a senior fellow at the New America Foundation and an editor at large at the Atlantic. Gillibrand "brings to her game a love of detail and dealmaking reminiscent of LBJ."

And while Sabrina Schaeffer, executive director of the conservative Independent Women's Forum, opposes Gillibrand's legislative agenda, she also says Gillibrand has a "girl-next-door personality women and men can identify with" and "has checked off all the right boxes on women's issues."

But Michael Barone, a political analyst and resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and contributor to Fox News, dismisses Gillibrand, saying: "I don't think many conservatives have given much thought to her. They see her as a conventional liberal in a safe seat with no national career in the short term."

Gillibrand's memoir, which she will promote on a coast-to-coast tour this month, will generate talk of a presidential run no matter how much she fends off the question.

"It's always a bit amusing when a relatively junior senator decides to offer up an autobiography," says U-Va.'s Sabato. "That means one thing: She's interested in higher office."

In style, however, Gillibrand's book differs significantly from previous political memoirs. Hers is a quick read, chatty, candid, with self-help and even diet advice. "It's not a policy book," she says.

Beltway commentators may find it frothy, but she says she wants to reach a wider set of readers, especially women, people who may not want an insider's account of life in Washington. "Empowerment of all women is important," she says, not just those who are seeking to crack the ceiling, or lean in or lean out.

She bristles at the debate about whether women can have it all. "It's an absurd argument." The very phrase "have it all," she says, implies that women are greedy and demeans stay-at-home mothers. For many mothers, she says, working is a financial necessity, not a choice, and she says she is particularly concerned about low-and-middle-income women, especially single moms. "I don't have their tough choices, but I share the same experience that they have," she says. "We all want to be good moms. We all want to be good at our jobs. We all want to provide for our children."

Still, if the question isn't about having it all, many who spend time around Kirsten Gillibrand seem to wonder how she does it all. She and her husband, Jonathan Gillibrand, a British-born financial manager, moved to Washington in 2007, but for the past two years, he has spent workweeks in New York City while their two boys stay with her.

"She is taking care of two small children and working her head off in the Senate," says Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, among the Republicans who backed Gillibrand on the military bill. "It's not like she has live-in help the way a lot of people in the Senate do, and I just don't know how she does it."

Gillibrand's mornings begin between 6 and 6:30, when Henry, her 6-year-old, a live wire who is starting first grade, wakes her. "Almost always, I feel exhausted when I get up," she says. She fixes breakfast for the boys, packs their lunches, does laundry or dishes, checks their homework and drives them to school. If she has time she stops at the gym for a workout and arrives in her office by 9. She's usually on Capitol Hill until late afternoon when she gets away to pick up the boys at school.

A trim 5-foot-2, she gains weight easily — 50 pounds when she was pregnant with Henry. When she got to the Senate, she went on a crash regimen, dropped her size to a 4 or 6 from 16, and was featured in Vogue. "If I eat more than 1,400 calories a day, I gain weight," she says. She cooks almost every weeknight, typically chicken, fish or lean beef, with salad and vegetables. A master juggler, she can cook, sweep, pick up schoolbooks and children's shoes lying about, and carry on a conversation at the same time.

After dinner, she might take Theo, who is 10 and in fifth grade, to sports practice or whatever is on his schedule. Like their mother, the boys lead busy lives: baseball, soccer, squash, T-ball, piano, singing and taekwondo. She tries to get to bed about 10. "If I don't get enough sleep, I get irritable and emotional."

The Gillibrands live in a three-story brick rowhouse on Capitol Hill. They have a sparsely furnished living room with an upright piano. The kitchen, a comfortable open space with a dining table, has framed photographs of the senator with the boys, Henry's crayon drawings, and notes on the refrigerator door. Parked out back is an old Porsche belonging to Gillibrand's husband, currently working with Formula One racing. "We use my van to get around," she says.

The couple met in 1999 when Jonathan, two years her junior, was getting an MBA at Columbia and she was working at Davis Polk. They were married in 2001. "We're opposites in many ways," she says. "That's probably why it works." Jonathan, who is private, methodical and thoughtful, has been encouraging her political career, offering cautious advice and absorbing criticism. But her first year in the House was difficult, as she recounts in her book. They lived with Theo in a Virginia suburb. Jonathan hated Washington and had no job. They argued. At one point he told her, "Your job is the reason we don't have more kids!" She realized he had a point. Soon she was pregnant with Henry.

When the family is together on weekends "we do things the boys like to do,'' usually sports, she says. "Jonathan is really good about chores. I do not nag him. I do not ask him to do things. I typically do the cooking because it relaxes me. But Jonathan helps clean up. He's is more supportive than the average husband."

For someone who is all about women forging ahead, it may seem ironic that she takes on the majority of parenting duties. But, she says: "I think most working moms do it all. They do a lot of caregiving. They do a lot of housework. And they work full time."

The next morning in her busy office, Henry is with her, slouching on the sofa, playing with pieces on a chessboard and trying hard to obey his mother and keep quiet.

Settling into a favorite wingback chair, Gillibrand says she wants to recruit 6 million women to active service in politics, businesses and communities. Six million is the number of women who entered the workforce to replace the men who had gone to battle during World War II.

Looking up at a poster of Rosie the Riveter, the advertising character who represented those women, Gillibrand echoes, "We can do it!"

Wall Street Journal: "Jeb Bush Sends Signals About 2016 Presidential Run"

By Brody Mullins and Beth Reinhard

September 4, 2014, 8:17 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] GOP Fundraisers Say Former Florida Governor's Aides Spread Word: Wait Until He Makes Up Mind

WASHINGTON—Republican strategists and fundraisers say Jeb Bush's closest advisers have been quietly spreading the word that they should avoid committing to other possible presidential candidates until he decides on his own course after the November election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The message from Mr. Bush's inner circle during the past few months is in part an effort to bat down speculation that the former Florida governor has ruled out a 2016 run, say GOP donors and strategists who have spoken with the Bush camp. The message, as one put it, is: "Before you do anything, let us know."

Jim Nicholson, a Bush supporter who served in President George W. Bush's cabinet, said: "I think the chances are better than 50-50 that he runs, and that is based on some conversations I've had with members of the Bush family."

Mr. Bush's aides aren't actively making calls but responding to supporters who are fielding inquiries from other potential candidates, according to those involved in the conversations.

Mr. Bush is a top choice of the establishment wing of the Republican Party. His entry would help define the policy fights of the primary process, as his support for overhauling immigration law and for the Common Core national educational standards has drawn strong opposition from many conservatives.

Mr. Bush, who is 61 years old, has said the impact of a presidential run on his family would be a paramount concern. One of his three children, Jeb Bush Jr., said the matter hasn't come up in family gatherings, though the issue is "the 800-pound gorilla in the room."

"A lot of people are waiting to see what Dad does," the junior Mr. Bush, who works at his father's Miami-area business consulting firm, said in an interview Thursday. "There's a lot of pressure to run."

Mr. Bush wasn't available for comment, a spokeswoman said. A top adviser, Sally Bradshaw, said: "There is no organized effort to actively recruit support for a presidential campaign. He is seriously considering the race and will make a decision sometime after November."

Mike Feldman, an aide on Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, said both Mr. Bush and likely Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton would campaign with tremendous advantages—and baggage—due to their families' long political history.

"Both of them would have to wrestle with the trade-offs involved in emphasizing their considerable experience and presenting a vision for the future while having to defend their records and litigating the past," he said.

Mr. Bush has built a life outside politics since leaving public office in 2007, serving on corporate boards, heading a business consulting firm and leading two educational think tanks.

His mother, former first lady Barbara Bush, has said she hopes he doesn't run, given that the nation has already been led by his father and brother.

The outreach from Mr. Bush's aides came amid speculation this summer that he was leaning against a run, due in part to reports that he was raising money for private-equity ventures when other potential candidates were visiting early-primary states.

Attention among some in the GOP returned to Mitt Romney, the party's nominee in 2012, who has said he is "not running," but has allowed that "circumstances can change." Messrs. Bush and Romney would compete for a similar set of fundraisers and political hands.

Many donors are both looking for a signal of intent from Mr. Bush but also are happy to stay on the sidelines until after the midterm elections, when the field will start to crystallize. For them, Mr. Bush's indecision is helpful.

"It's frozen the field a bit, in that it's a convenient excuse for finance people to stay neutral and wait to commit," said Republican strategist Dave Carney, a top adviser to Rick Perry's 2012 campaign who worked in the White House for George W. Bush.

"It's not like Jeb would walk into the race and clear the field, but his gravitas and fundraising network makes him a first-class competitor," Mr. Carney said.

In addition to keeping potential donors and supporters on deck, Mr. Bush is taking other steps that typically precede a presidential campaign: traveling the country, engaging in public policy debates and raising money for his party.

A newly established fundraising committee allows him to funnel donations from his financial backers to GOP candidates key to winning a majority in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. Bush is slated to headline a Sept. 23 event in Tampa that organizers hope will raise as much as $1 million for GOP Senate candidates Cory Gardner in Colorado, Joni Ernst in Iowa, Monica Wehby in Oregon, Tom Cotton in Arkansas and Dan Sullivan in Alaska. A Bush aide said the goal was $500,000.

The host committee of more than three dozen people is expected to form the backbone of a finance committee should Mr. Bush run for president. Chairmen include John Rood, a real-estate developer and the former ambassador to the Bahamas; Al Hoffman, a real-estate developer and former Republican National Committee finance chairman; and John Kirtley, a school-choice proponent and the co-founder of the KLH Capital investment firm.

"I think of it as a fan club and a team that would be ready to work on behalf of his presidential campaign if he decides to run," said Jorge Arrizurieta, a longtime supporter of Mr. Bush and his family. "If the event is successful, that will be helpful to him as a potential presidential candidate, but the objective is to make sure Republicans are successful in the current election cycle."

Mr. Bush also is planning to attend fundraisers for Illinois gubernatorial candidate Bruce Rauner on Sept. 18 in Chicago and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell in Coral Gables on Sept. 19.

He already has helped raise money for a number of GOP candidates, many of them in states crucial to winning the 2016 nomination. They have included Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad, South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley, Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval and Florida Gov. Rick Scott.

"He's definitely got a lot of favors out there if he decides to pull the trigger," said Florida-based consultant Mike Hanna, who worked on Mr. Bush's gubernatorial campaigns.

New York Times: “New Book Says C.I.A. Official in Benghazi Held Up Rescue”

By David D. Kirkpatrick

September 4, 2014

CAIRO — Five commandos guarding the C.I.A. base in Benghazi, Libya, in September 2012 say that the C.I.A. station chief stopped them from interceding in time to save the lives of Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and an American technician during the attack on the diplomatic mission there.

In a new book scheduled for release next week and obtained by The New York Times, the commandos say they protested repeatedly as the station chief ordered them to wait in their vehicles, fully armed, for 20 minutes while the attack on the diplomatic mission was unfolding less than a mile away.

“If you guys do not get here, we are going to die!” a diplomatic security agent then shouted to them over the radio, the commandos say in the book, and they left the base in defiance of the chief’s continuing order to “stand down.”

The book, titled “13 Hours,” is the first public account of the night’s events by any of the American security personnel involved in the attack. The accusation that the station chief, referred to in the book only as “Bob,” held back the rescue opens a new front in a fierce political battle over who is at fault for the American deaths.

Republicans have blamed President Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton, then the secretary of state, for the security failure.

American officials have previously acknowledged that the Central Intelligence Agency security team paused to try to enlist support from Libyan militia allies. But the book is the first detailed account of the extent of the delay, its consequences for the rescue attempt, and who made the decisions.

The commandos’ account — which fits with the publicly known facts and chronology — suggests that the station chief issued the “stand down” orders on his own authority. He hoped to enlist local Libyan militiamen, and the commandos speculate that he hoped the Libyans could carry out the rescue alone to avoid exposing the C.I.A. base.

No meaningful Libyan help ever materialized.

In an emailed statement on Thursday, a senior intelligence official said “a prudent, fast attempt was made to rally local support for the rescue effort and secure heavier weapons.” The official said “there was no second-guessing those decisions being made on the ground” and “there were no orders to anybody to stand down in providing support.”

The commandos were former members of American Special Forces teams hired by the intelligence agency as private contractors. Two of the team, both former Navy Seals, died fighting the attackers at the C.I.A. base later that night. Five others are credited as co-authors of “13 Hours,” which was written with their cooperation by Mitchell Zuckoff, a professor of journalism at Boston University. Mark Geist, Kris Paronto and John Tiegen are credited by name, and two of the authors use pseudonyms.

They say that they learned that the mission’s building had been set on fire during the short drive there, from another plea for help over the radio. The ambassador and the technician, Sean Smith, suffocated in the smoke.

No American fired a weapon of any kind in defense of the mission until the C.I.A. commandos reached the compound, more than 40 minutes after the attack began, the commandos say. The Libyan guards hired to protect the mission quickly retreated. The handful of diplomatic security agents, caught by surprise and outnumbered, withdrew to separate buildings without firing a shot.

One of the commandos fired grenades to help disperse the attackers and clear an entrance to the mission. They later exchanged fire when the attackers returned for a second assault. And the commandos say that after pulling back to the C.I.A. base they fought off-and-on gun battles with fighters lurking in the shadows outside for much of the night.

Although the commandos write of several Libyans who risked their lives to help the Americans, the difficulty of discerning friend from foe is a recurring theme. They write that a supportive militia leader who appeared to be helping them approach the mission also said he was talking on the phone with the attackers, trying to negotiate.

“What’s the difference between how Libyans look when they’re coming to help you versus when they’re coming to kill you?” the commandos joked with the diplomatic security agents. “Not much.”

The contractors say they raced so quickly to arm themselves when they heard the alarm that one failed to put on underwear. Another went into the battle in cargo shorts.

Then, fully armed, they found themselves waiting inside their armored vehicles, making small talk.

“Hey, we gotta go now! We’re losing the initiative!” Mr. Tiegen says he complained to the station chief, who he says replied, “No, stand down, you need to wait.”

“We are going to have the local militia handle it,” the chief added later, according to the commandos.

Commotion Over Ad-Libbed Remarks Fills Divide Between Two Jebs

Jeb Bush speaking at a Southern Baptist Conference ev ent in Nashville on Tuesday. Mark Humphrey/Associated Press

By Michael Barbaro

Good Wednesday morning from Washington, where all eyes are on Thursday's Republican debate now that the lineup has been finalized . Jeb Bush is among those who made the cut, but on Tuesday, he rekindled some concerns about his propensity for off-the-cuff remarks that often require subsequent clarification.

Mr. Bush promised to be candid and unscripted in his joyful run for president. Now he's paying the price.

Over and over, his ad-libbed answers have created distracting kerfuffles (witness his claim that Americans "need to work longer hours") and, worse, drawn-out controversies (see his handling of a question about the invasion of Iraq).

Now, on the cusp of Thursday's prime-time Republican debate, his team is grappling with an uncomfortable but inevitable question: Is Jeb his own worst enemy in the Republican contest?

Tuesday's errant remark about women's health funding is a case study in the dangers of letting Jeb be Jeb. It was as if Mr. Bush was doing rough math in his head – what to do with $500 million in federal funding he wants to strip from Planned Parenthood? – but instead he was on a stage, thinking aloud. And so all the world heard him utter words that no candidate for president wants to say on camera: "I'm not sure we need half a billion dollars for women's health issues." (He has since said he "misspoke." But the video lives on, tweeted and retweeted into eternity.)

Political mayhem ensued, just as it did when Mr. Bush talked about the productivity of the American worker.

Jeb the policy maven has not quite reconciled with Jeb the presidential candidate, as his own aides more or less concede.

In their minds, this is a source of pride – it's what makes Mr. Bush authentic. But it is just as much a liability that will create the kind of video footage that can be lethal in a negative campaign advertisement.

At Thursday's debate in Cleveland, the two Jebs will share a very prominent stage, and it will be fascinating to see which one wins the tug-of-war.

What We're Watching Today

- President Obama, who is rolling out a multipronged campaign of private entreaties and public advocacy over the next several weeks to build support in Congress for the nuclear deal with Iran, will speak at American University in Washington. He will seek to explain and defend the international agreement reached last month, which would lift some sanctions in exchange for restrictions on Iran's ability to develop a nuclear weapon.

- The Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee will also discuss the Iran deal, holding a hearing on "The Implications of Sanctions Relief Under the Iran Agreement."

- And with the Republican candidates off the trail in preparation for the debate, the Democratic candidates have the field to themselves, with former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland in Iowa on Wednesday, and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, former Gov. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and former Senator Jim Webb of Virginia joining him there on Thursday to speak at an organized labor

Senate Cybersecurity Bill Faces Another Uphill Battle

The Senate faces another showdown vote on cybersecurity legislation on Wednesday, illustrating anew the struggle the Senate faces in passing even a modest computer system protection bill despite escalating security threats.

With just a few days remaining before the Senate is scheduled to join the House on summer vacation, officials were uncertain lawmakers would agree to even open debate on the measure, which had already been the subject of a few false starts.

As is the wont of the Senate, procedure and politics keep getting in the way and sniping over possible amendments is threatening the measure that had seemed headed for easy passage when it cleared the Intelligence Committee in the spring with little opposition.

Senator Mitch McConnell, the Kentucky Republican and majority leader, had been expected to get the ball rolling on the legislation last week, but instead turned his attention to a bill to defund Planned Parenthood, which went down in a fireball of emotional debate on Monday.

Now with time running short, Senator Rand Paul, Republican of Kentucky and one of several senators with privacy concerns about the bill, wants to propose changes, including one concerning auditing the Federal Reserve.

Even if the Senate takes up the legislation, it is unclear lawmakers itching to get out of town will want to stick around to complete the measure. And Mr. Paul and the three other Republican senators running for president intend to be at the debates.

The Senate now finds itself lagging the House, which in April passed an expansive measure that would push companies to share access to their computer networks and records with federal investigators in response to a series of computer security breaches in government and in the private sector.

Senator Cornyn Prepares a Potentially Bipartisan Gun Law

Senator John Cornyn of Texas, the No. 2 Republican, plans on Wednesday to introduce a measure intended to keep firearms out of the hands of mentally ill offenders and to step up community training and prevention programs to reduce the threat of violence involving people with mental illnesses.

Months in the making, the Mental Health and Safe Communities Act would clarify the types and scope of mental health records that are to be shared through the National Instant Criminal Background Check, with the aim of preventing episodes like the recent shooting in a Louisiana movie theater.

Despite deep differences over gun safety legislation, members of both parties have agreed that better mental health screening and treatment is a potential area of consensus, providing a possible opening for the legislation Mr. Cornyn developed.

It is not without a degree of political risk for Mr. Cornyn, who was criticized by some gun-rights advocates when he introduced an earlier version of the measure. But the National Rifle Association is behind the bill, aides say.

Children's Issues Group to Run Ad Campaign in Iowa

Presidential candidates are not the only ones courting Iowans because of their influence in anointing future presidents.

Groups with policy agendas are also landing in the Hawkeye State, hoping that Iowans will pass on their messages to the White House hopefuls who are parading through their towns.

The Save the Children Action Network is starting a $750,000 advertising campaign and field operation in Iowa on Wednesday to raise the profile of its High 5 for Kids early childhood education campaign.

The nonpartisan ads will feature a Democrat, a Republican and an independent and will run in Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Sioux City in August. Print and digital ads will coincide with a door-to-door canvassing operation in five counties.

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Save the Children, said the initiative was meant to "influence Iowa caucusgoers to make early childhood education a priority for the presidential candidates."

The group already has radio advertisements running in New Hampshire,

The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, “politics as usual’ is immediately heard as “politics as usual in Clinton-world.”

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon's 'silent majority,' -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women's rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

"The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which "brings us together in a peaceful loving state."

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking's insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Subject: Three recommendations for Obama Administration posts

Chris,

I hope the transition work is going well. It is, as you know, just about the most important work on the planet now. I am even more happy knowing how talented the transition team itself is!

You asked me to send you some good recommendations. Here are three:

1. For the National Security Council---expert on bioterrorism. Dr. Tara O'Toole. Dr. O'Toole is CEO and Director of the Center for Biosecurity at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center (UPMC),served as Assistant Secretary of Energy for Environment, Safety and Health in the Clinton Administration. In this position she developed the first strategic management and safety plan for dealing with the highly enriched uranium, plutonium, spent fuel, and radioactive waste left in place when nuclear weapons production ceased in the early 1990s. She ran the multi-agency, multimillion dollar task force that oversaw the government's investigations into human radiation experiments conducted during the Cold War, and led the US delegation to Russia to establish the U.S./Russia cooperative effort to study radiation exposure and environmental hazards of the Russian nuclear weapons complex. Tara is one of the top talents on the committee which I chair, established by HSPD 21, the National Biosurveillance Advisory Subcommittee. Tara is well known to everyone in the field but in addition to her academic chops, brings a passion and practical knowledge impossible to beat.

2. To run DARPA---which among other things gave rise to the Internet, TCP/IP and so many other innovations. Vint Cerf, known affectionately as the "Father of the Internet" winner of all sorts of awards, former SVP of MCI and now VP and Chief Evangelist for Google. I was pleasantly surprised from a recent conversation to know that he would be interested in going back into government into the same agency he worked for when the Internet was born. Vint knows everyone and every major advance in tech. I do not know how good a manager he is, but I do know that his name is gold, his understanding unequaled, and his values solid.

3. At a lower level, and with the realization that I am no longer an objective observer: for a position in the the White House, Office of Communications, my son Joseph Brilliant. Joe was the youngest ever Intern in the Clinton White House (under Tom Kalil, Laura Tyson), Berkeley communications major, worked at Ogilvy and Deutsch in advertising and most recently worked with Al Gore's CurrentTV. Joe helped build the online social networking part of Current.com, worked as an Obama volunteer in New Mexico, and wants to put his social networking skills to service in the communications office keeping Obama youthful supporters engaged, informed, energized, and involved in building a new participatory administration. Al Gore has told us he would give him a very high recommendation. So would I!

Hope everything else is going very well indeed. Much love to Maria.

Larry

I agree with Jen we should try to avoid Tuesday if that is possible. I like having her do it Wednesday, if we can make it til then -- saying a couple declarative sentences rejecting the basic premise [and expressing pride in Foundation's work], pointing to website, and then pivoting to positive message.

Friends - I wanted to lay out some issues to consider related to Clinton Cash and making news next week for discussion on Monday morning's call. Hope you are enjoying great weather in the meantime. JP

HRC ENGAGEMENT ON CLINTON CASH

The biggest question for this group is if and how HRC engages on Clinton Cash this week and what are the "two lines" she would deliver.

Reminder on this week's events for her. WJC on Today show on Monday; HRC in Vegas on Tuesday in front of the pool for an immigration event; fundraiser and lunch with the Mayor in SFO on Wednesday; LA fundraisers on Thursday; Bay Area fundraiser on Friday. All of the fundraisers are closed. To restate what we all discussed on Thursday and Friday - I would rather she not engage with press while we are in Vegas. Like to keep her on immigration and we handle response.

Below is a written statement Dan had drafted when we thought she might engage on this last week - so gives folks something to react to:

Statement from Hillary Clinton:
The suggestion that I or President Obama or any other senior official in this administration would ever allow decisions about national security to influenced by personal considerations – let alone some charitable donations – is absurd. Anyone who's had to sit in the Situation Room and make life and death choices would understand that. And if anyone ever donated to the Clinton Foundation in the hopes of influencing official government policy, they'd be a fool. Even the author himself has now admitted that he found zero evidence of any wrong-doing or quid pro quo. Unfortunately, the incredible life-saving work of the Clinton Foundation has gotten lost in these attacks. More than 9 million people with HIV/AIDS around the world have benefited from more affordable medicine because of the Clinton Foundation. Millions of American children have access to healthier food. Farmers in Africa are growing better crops. Women entrepreneurs are starting businesses. I'm so proud of the work that Bill, Chelsea, and all the professionals at the Foundation have done and continue to do. And I hope that people will judge the Foundation on that record of accomplishment, not on baseless conspiracy theories

CLINTON CASH RESPONSE/LAUNCH OF "THE BRIEFING"

On Tuesday morning we will launch The Briefing page on our website. This page will be where supporters and others can get information and points on what she is for, but also where we would post pushback on the book. Below is what we currently plan to post on Tuesday related to the book.

We are also considering a Podesta post that we would put on Medium and our site that unveils the concept of The Briefing, debunks the book a bit, and notes that while we will respond aggressively to attacks - we know that they are just designed to stop her bc R's know that she has right vision/policies to win and will not be distracted from our main highway of selling the positive. John and I discussed yesterday and think it is important that supporters and press know that we will deal aggressively with unfair attacks, but our real focus and her's is her proactive vision. Important that we do not appear beleaguered.

Clinton Cash Content for The Briefing:

1) a comprehensive post that debunks the book with all of our attacks in one place;

2) a short video narrated by Brian Fallon highlighting most egregious errors (we will need more time to do comprehensive version we discussed with HRC on Friday, but think it is worth doing short one for the book release on Tuesday);

3) a number of social media products that our supporters can share and are designed to get buzz with press and supporters and further discredit the author and the book;

4) the products we have already put out over the course of the last week.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/22/08

Main Topics: Withdrawal From Iraq, VP rumors, Obama in Middle East

Summary: Today, Senator Obama's Middle East trip led the news cycle again, but garnered less attention than in the past days. The McCain campaign was successful in its efforts to divert some coverage by leaking the possibility of a surprise VP-pick this week. Although most media outlets took the bait and devoted a considerable amount of airtime to McCain VP-speculation 'news,' still most anchors were more interested in reporting about al-Maliki's virtual endorsement of the Obama 16 month withdrawal plan. Though McCain surrogate Rudy Giuliani made the interview rounds claiming the success of the surge, he found had no effective message for combating the view that the White House proposed 'time horizon' is essentially the same as a phased withdrawal. Domestic news covered stocks trading low on Wall St., hyping the Olympics, and Osama bin Laden's driver going to trial. On the international front, the Serbian General accused of genocide is going to court while a Russian report indicates Russia may place bombers capable of carrying nuclear weapon loads in Cuba as a response to NATO bases/missile defense stations in Eastern Europe. And finally, if you are seeking the perfect pedicure, the national networks all focused on a special salon in Alexandria, VA that offers a service where fish are used to nibble off dead skin.

2. NBC: Giuliani repeats support of surge, attacks Reid and Obama for seeking to 'lose'

Giuliani Claims Big Difference Between Time Horizon and Withdrawal (MSNBC 07/22/08)
WILLIE GEIST: Is Iraq at all coming around to Barack Obama's position?

RUDY GIULIANI: I think its dramatically the opposite. I mean a year ago- I was in the campaign a year ago. Barack Obama was calling for no surge, pullout, which would have been big loss for the United States. The only reason Barack Obama is able to make this trip to Iraq is the surge that he didn't support worked which I think says something about his lack of experience in foreign policy. If Barack Obama had been President, we would have had a major loss in Iraq, we would not be talking about a surge working, we would not tentative pullout dates, and I have the same position I've always had about this and I think it's the sound one – pull out happens on success. If that's 2010, wonderful. And the only reason that would be the case is the soldiers did such a wonderful job with the surge. To give the enemy a timetable of your retreat, has never happened at a time of war. That would be a terrible mistake. That was a big mistake when Barack Obama did it a year ago, the facts have proven that. And I think its going to hurt him a lot in the Presidential campaign. First of all he was dead wrong about the surge.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Have the White House putting out a time horizon, which I'm sorry I don't see a lot of difference between a time horizon-

GIULIANI: Big difference.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BRZEZINSKI: Really?

GIULIANI: Sure you talk about maybe if the facts dictate it you could get out in 2010, 2011, 2012, you don't give a time table.

BRZEZINSKI: That's a shift though for the administration. They used to talk about no timelines, not talking about time at all because its dangerous, and now they're seeing a shift, because the surge appears to be working.

GIULIANI: Well, the President said a year and a half ago, withdraw on success. We are now having success. It seems to me the only reason we can realistically and seriously talk about withdrawal is because we're having success. He wouldn't talk about it when we had failure. That makes sense. If you're getting to a point where you're having success, you can start talking about withdrawing troops. They have drawn back some of the surge. Not all of the surge I think at this point, although there are more troops there than in 2007.

BRZEZINSKI: So where does that leave John McCain?

GIULIANI: It leaves John McCain in the very enviable position of having been the strongest proponent of the surge against tremendous criticism in the Senate, particularly from Barack Obama. John McCain turns out to be right, I know the media has a hard time of this, but Obama turns out to be completely wrong.

BRZEZINSKI: You could argue though if you continue the path that McCain is putting forward that our troops are going to be worn thin and not used in areas they are needed. When you think of whats happening in Pakistan, and when you think of what is happening in Afghanistan, and you think of some of the problems percolating in Iran, are we going to be ready if we continue this engagement at this level, and do we need to be continuing at this level. Do we need to quote win?

GIULIANI: Mika, you can say that, but it would turn out to be wrong. John McCain has turned out to be right. That by having the surge, We are now able to draw down troops. And we're able to draw down troops in a way in which America should draw down troops. And you ask me should America win, the only person I can think of that didn't want America to win was Harry Reid when he announced prematurely that America had lost in Iraq. Of course we have to win. It's not about winning like a baseball game. It's about avoiding chaos in the Middle East, it's about avoiding civil war there, it's about having an American ally next to a country that is dangerous to the United States-Iran. Rather than having a country that is an ally of Iran. These are all fundamental issues of foreign policy, which I think Barack Obama misses because in the coverage of Barack Obama, we've missed how inexperienced he is.

Highlight #2
Giuliani Touts Surge, Attacks Obama and Reid For Not Supporting It (NBC 07/22/08)
RUDY GIULIANI: Good morning, David.

DAVID GREGORY: Thinking about Veepstakes, you know Senator McCain well. You're an astute observer of the political landscape. I won't ask you who, but what kind of Vice President, what is Senator McCain need in a Vice President?

GIULIANI: He needs the same thing any Presidential candidate needs; he needs someone who can be President of the United States, particularly in the times we live in. Threat of terrorism, the significant problems we face in foreign policy, domestic policy. You need someone who can step right in, where the American people can accept that person as being just as qualified as the Presidential candidates.

GREGORY: That'll be the top consideration?

GIULIANI: I think so […]

GREGORY: Let me turn to Iraq this morning. Lot of news, Senator Obama on this trip and he said late last night that if he had it to do over again, he would not support the troop surge in Iraq. McCain has already been critical about that. What do you think that should say to voters about his view of the war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GIULIANI: I don't understand what Obama is saying. He goes to Iraq to go on a fact-finding mission. And the facts that he finds are that violence is down 70, 80%, that everyone believes, particularly the military commanders he's taking to that it's a great success, the only reason that al-Maliki is talking about possible withdrawal in 2010 is because the surge has worked, that's the only way he could be talking about something like that. And we don't know if it will happen or not depending on the facts on the ground. So I think it either indicates Senator Obama is not on a fact finding mission because the facts don't seem to affect him or Senator Obama has a stubbornness of wanting to stick to his political position, which now turns out to be incorrect. The position he took a year ago, to oppose the surge, would have left us with a great loss and a Middle East in chaos right. The position that was the correct one that turned out historically to be correct is the position that we should have done the surge.

GREGORY: Alright, but let's take on this argument a little that because Mr. Mayor as you know, Senator McCain has effectively chalked up Obama's position on Iraq to naivety, that he's effectively called for surrender, and yet to sticking to an idea of a 6 month phased withdrawal from Iraq, that has ultimately been validated by the Iraqi prime minister, hasn't that effectively refuted that argument?

GIULIANI: Of course not, you wouldn't be there if the surge didn't work. Unless you wanted to pull out the troops. In the midst of chaos, unless you wanted to create civil war in Iraq. These are the facts that Senator Obama ignored a year ago. It now turns out had you not had the surge, either we would be in a much worse situation in Iraq, or as the Democrats and Harry Reid wanted to do, would have declared that we would have losed and pulled out.

GREGORY: Do you think Obama lacks sound foreign policy judgment on Iraq?

GIULIANI: I think he lacks experience. I think its clear. Actually I think there is nothing clearer in this campaign that Senator Obama doesn't have the usual that a Presidential candidate has and particularly at a time as sensitive as this.

GREGORY: But he wants to focus on Pakistan, Iran, all those areas in Afghanistan, something you called for during your Presidential campaign.

GIULIANI: We all called for that, including Senator McCain. We had the exact same position on it. We were talking about it long before Senator Obama was talking about it. We should put more emphasis on Pakistan, and Afghanistan, that region. I've been calling for that for 2 years. And even longer. After all, we don't want the Taliban to reemerge after the good work we did in 2002. And they are reemerging.

Giuliani: Never Give a Timeline for Withdrawal, Times Guilty of Censorship (CNN 07/22/08 7:59am)
KIRAN CHETRY: Rudy Giuliani . . . said Obama's trip highlights his inexperience and he joins me now.

RUDY GIULIANI: It's extraordinary. It's going to be his first trip on Germany. His first trip to Germany, he's running for president of the United States.

CHETRY: . . . he didn't have any missteps in any of the countries.

GIULIANI: I think he did. The interview I saw last night saying he would vote the exactly the same way on the surge now after having gone there so what kind of fact-finding trip is this? It's just to find the facts that he wants. The reality is that Iraq is now 80% safer than it was a year ago before surge . . . everyone is talking about the fact it's been successful, and the reason we can talk about withdrawal on success rather than withdrawal with loss and ignominy, which is what we were talking about earlier is because the surge was successful . . .

CHETRY: Let me ask you this, because . . . it appears that Barack Obama and Iraq's president are on the same page talking about 16 months when we'd see a majority of U.S. troops out of Iraq.

GIULIANI: Somehow I knew it would be a favorable headline for Barack Obama. How did I guess that? How did I know this was going to result –

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHETRY: Is John McCain also moving his timeline up? Because he previously said the majority of the troops out 2013 if all goes well.

GIULIANI: He did.

CHETRY: Yesterday he seemed to indicate that 2010 may not be out of the realm.

GIULIANI: The extraordinary thing about this is that Barack Obama goes to an Iraq that he wanted to pull out a year ago. Declare an American loss, and we have a victory against all of the odds, particularly most of the media predicting it. And John McCain -- if we're looking at a president who has the judgment and experience to handle foreign policy and military policy on this major call, John McCain was right, and Barack Obama was completely, absolutely wrong. Had we followed his prescription

CHIETRY: Is Barack Obama right about the 16-month timeline for when we can probably see the majority of the US. troops out?

GIULIANI: My view? My view is you never give a timeline for a withdrawal, that it is dangerous for troops to do that.

CHETRY: We got the news early this morning, in fact, that it appears one of our top allies, the UK, is giving a timeline as well, saying the majority of their troops could probably be out, especially the Basra area by 2009.

GIULIANI: First of all, I don't like the idea of timelines for withdrawal in times before, I've never heard of it before where in the middle of the war you say we're going to pull out this date, that date, this other date. You create a tremendous advantage for your enemy. You create a whole focus for knowing how to create disturbance and chaos and the exact right time . . . There is a subtlety to it. If what you're talking about is as we have success we will withdrawal and we will make the determination of when that is, and hopefully that success will continue. It will come in a year, two years or three years, that's fine.

CHETRY: Is it the United States or is it the Iraqi government to seems to be much more eager?

GIULIANI: We'll work it out together . . . first we have to establish our view and then we have to negotiate it with them . . . the president put this best a long time ago when he announced the surge. I liked the way he put it . . . he said, yes, we're going to withdraw. We're going to withdraw on success. And now because of the success of the surge -- which Barack Obama opposed, strongly, and John McCain was the strongest advocate of, because of that surge we can talk about the possibility of withdrawal in a realistic way.

CHETRY: Now, in a draft copy of the op-ed that John McCain submitted to The New York Times he talked about that. He talked about the surge situation. I want to ask you—

GIULIANI: Which they wouldn't publish!

CHETRY: I want to ask you about the situation. They wouldn't publish it in the current form. They said it was more a rebuttal, it was more a bashing of Barack Obama as opposed to specifics about troop withdrawals and timelines. You yourself have had op-eds. Is it a back-and-forth process?

GIULIANI: I've never read a reply that the editor is basically telling you that you have to respond to your opponent. I'm not happy with what you said. I want you to have timelines. I want you do have dates.

CHETRY: So that is something unusual. The Times is saying it's the back and forth that is usually?

GIULIANI: That's not the back and forth I've had. I've written many op-eds including The New York Times. Sometimes argue over, it's too long, it's too short. There's a paragraph or two that doesn't make sense. It's more of an analysis of your composition and your English and does that make sense. But what that report back from the Times is saying is that they want to change the content

Bash Reports on McCain's Activities while Obama is Away (FNC 07/22/08 6:32am)
JOHN ROBERTS: McCain says he, not Obama, has had the correct message all along and as Dana Bash tells us, the message is resonating with voters . . .

DANA BASH: . . . when John McCain was asked by reporters whether or not he's finding it hard to get attention while Barack Obama is overseas, he shrugged and said, "It is what it is." But that belies an intense effort inside the McCain camp to keep Obama from using this trip abroad to burnish his foreign policy credentials.

JOHN MCCAIN: It was the surge that was, that is, that is winning this war. He opposed it.

BASH: John McCain's message: Barack Obama may have the spotlight but I'm the one that should get the credit.

MCCAIN: When you win wars, troops come home, and we are winning. And the fact is, if we'd've done what Senator Obama wanted to do, we would've lost and would've had a wider war.

BASH: What McCain aides are trying to protect is one of the few areas where he beats Obama. Big time. Ability to be Commander in Chief. The latest Washington Post poll gives McCain a twenty-four point lead on the issue and some Republicans are quite alarmed at the Iraqi Prime Minister's weekend comments that appeared to support Obama's 16-month withdrawal deadline which McCain opposes. [to McCain] Does it trouble you that that seems to undercut the message that you have against Barack Obama?

MCCAIN: Doesn't in the slightest undercut the fact that it's based on conditions on the ground.

BASH: McCain pointed to the US Military commander for political back-up. Joint Chiefs Mike Mullen who said this Sunday about Obama's withdrawal plan.

MIKE MULLEN: I think the consequences could be very dangerous in that regard.

MCCAIN: I hope we'll pay attention to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, particularly someone who has no military experience whatsoever.

BASH: That line hitting Obama about lacking military experience was no accident. With everyone from the White House to the Iraqi government talking more and more about troop withdrawal, what McCain is trying to do is make this a debate about who's best to be sitting in the oval office to make tough calls on how and when to bring troops home . . .

For Conservative Christians Obama/McCain Choice is Between a "Third-Rate Fireman and a First-Class Arsonist" (FNC 07/22/08 6:51am)

[. . .]

GRETCHEN CARLSON: I want to ask you about Dr. Dobson because he came out originally and said . . . I just really can't support John McCain and now on his radio show yesterday, he's saying, well, hmm, maybe . . . what will the influence be to the layperson?

RICHARD LANG: Well, I think it'll have more impact with lay people than it will with anybody else because Dr. Dobson has a huge following . . . it will have a big impact if he chooses to endorse Sen. McCain.

DOOCY: One of the things that Dobson said . . . . was John McCain, the lesser of two evils. He simply does not like Barack Obama's stance on abortion. He's pro-abortion. Is that your feeling as well?

LANG: Well, I think Sen. Obama is one of the most radically pro-abortion candidate to ever be nominated by a major party . . .

[. . .]

LANG: . . . what I hear all the time from people all across the country who are evangelicals is look, John McCain wasn't my first choice, John McCain wasn't my second choice but I'll take a third-rate fireman over a first-class arsonist and they see Barack Obama as a first-class arsonist for the things they believe in . . .

Blackburn Confronted For Saying Obama Not Listening To Iraqis, Presses Support For Surge
(MSNBC 07/22/08)
RON ALLEN: Representative, Senator McCain was really pushing for Barack Obama to go to Iraq, but now it appears that Obama's plan for withdrawal really closely matches what the Iraqis are saying. So, does John McCain still believe that foreign policy, national security, is a weakness for Obama?

MARSHA BLACKBURN: Well Ron I'm going to have to tell you: Senator Obama thinks his plan matches the Iraqis and General Petraeus, then he must not have taken his earplugs out when he got out of that C130 from going into Iraq. Because what we continue to hear is that it can't be date driven, that its got to be facts on the ground that decide when troops leave.

ALLEN: But correct me if I'm wrong, but I believe the Prime Minister said he envisions U.S. troops being gone by 2010 which again matches somewhat the 16 month timeline that-

BLACKBURN: What he envisions is conditions improving and of course we know that Maliki would like to see things improve quickly-as would we-we all, we want our troops to leave in victory. And we want things to be stable in Iraq. And we know what we have to see is the right conditions on the ground. Facts have to be there. We need to be listening to the troops. We need to be listening to the generals because they're the ones that have the best measure and I've got troops that are in their 3rd deployment. Our troops from Fort Campbell are in that third deployment. I get the best information from them. I found Ron that they are the realists.

ALLEN: Let me ask you this. What does John McCain envision for the right circumstance in the ground? I believe he expects most troops to be out by the end of his first term, but at the same time he says that the surge is working and accomplishing his mission. So if the surge is working, why can't the troops leave sooner?

BLACKBURN: Well the surge is working. And I have found it so interesting that Senator Obama would say that he didn't think the surge worked then he was the beneficiary of being there, being protected by those troops who have carried that surge out and have made the surge work. It has provided improvement in Iraq. Even I was reading the transcript of an interview he had with a ABC correspondent who was recounting the amount of improvement there in Iraq and still he was denying that the surge was there. So [cross talk] create those facts how you want them to be. The point is the surge has worked. And things are better. Now there are no garauntees, everybody knows that. We all hope to see a stable secure Iraq who is a partner with us.

Saban hints: Clinton opposes the Iran deal

By Naomi Friedman

Just minutes before Hillary Clinton announced her candidacy for the 2016 presidential election, Israeli Channel One News interviewed Haim Saban, an American-Israeli media magnate and long-time Clinton supporter. Noticeably excited, he explained that she had waited to make the announcement until she had carefully prepared the ground for her campaign.

Then came the big question: What is her position on the Iran deal?

ADVERTISEMENT

Saban responded carefully, “She will have to, at some stage, express her opinion. But we know that in essence and in every important matter, she is committed to the security of Israel. She is a friend of the State of Israel. And we've seen this over the past 25 to 30 years. So, there won't be any problems with relations between the United States and Israel when Hillary Clinton is president. No problem. On the contrary.”

But Ya’akov Ayalon, the host of the nightly Channel One news pressed on: And where does Hillary Clinton stand on this issue?

"I know where she stands but I can't talk about it," Saban admitted.

"Give me a hint," Ayalon had to ask.

"I hinted to you – that I know," Saban couldn’t repress a laugh. "But I can't reveal to you things that were said behind closed doors. She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this.”

The implication: Clinton is against the Iran deal.

Why? Because Israelis – across the political spectrum – are against the deal, and Saban knows this. From the extreme left of Zionist parties and partisans to the extreme right, Israelis oppose the deal. For Haaretz reporter Ari Shavit , it’s President Obama’s big mistake. Former Prime Minister and head of the Labor Party Ehud Barak came right out and urged the United States to tell Iran to “dismantle or else .” Barak said, "The Pentagon and the forces of America under the backing and probable directive of the [US] president [could] create an extremely effective means to destroy the Iranian nuclear military program over a fraction of one night.” And as the former IDF Chief of General Staff and Israeli Minister of Defense, Barak might know a thing or two about this topic.

Barak is not alone. Israelis, across the political spectrum, want the military option on the table – on the negotiating table, where it belongs. The debate in Israel is not whether the deal is good. It’s whether Prime Minister Netanyahu is responsible for the bad deal – by spoiling Israel’s relations with the United States, or whether Obama is responsible for the bad deal by virtue of his unrealistic idealism and tendency to over-compromise.

So when Yaakov Ayalon says, “Give me a hint” and Haim Saban says “I hinted to you – that I know,” and just after he’s said “there won’t be any problems with relations between the United States and Israel when Hillary Clinton is president,” that means he is convinced that Hillary Clinton is against the Iran deal.

And this is big news. Israelis have been anxiously waiting for Hillary Clinton to openly state her position on the Iran deal. Congress is the last bastion of hope for Israel. Well before the P5+1 negotiations in Lausanne, Israeli news analysts focused intently on the Corker-Menendez bill. If Hillary Clinton comes out against the deal, more Democrats will join Republicans in demanding that Iran abandon its nuclear ambitions. And this is what Israelis, across the political spectrum, are praying for.

Friedman is an American-Israeli writer and editor in the fields of political science, history, and information technology.

McCain Suggests a Large Withdrawal from Iraq, under His Presidency, by 2013 (NBC 07/24/08 7:05pm)
BRIAN WILLIAMS: He's campaigning hard at home in the US today. Where he strongly pointed out his view that Barack Obama should be too. […]

KELLY O'DONNELL: Today in Columbus, Ohio, John McCain chose to visit a neighborhood known as German Village, a spot intended to contrast Obama's Berlin event. Do you believe it's appropriate to hold a political rally of that scale in a foreign country?

JOHN MCCAIN: I would rather speak at a rally or a gathering, any place outside of the United States after I am President of the United States. But that's a judgment that Senator Obama and the American people will make.

O'DONELL: McCain made his own stinging judgment this week on Obama and the Iraq war.

MCCAIN: Senator Obama would rater lose a war in order to win a political campaign.

O'DONNELL: Do you believe Obama would really be willing to lose the war in Iraq?

MCCAIN: I don't think he understands the serious consequences of failure in Iraq. Therefore he treats it as just another political issue.

O'DONNELL: Rather than a timetable for withdrawal, McCain says more American soldiers will leave Iraq based on improved conditions.

MCCAIN: I am sure that by the end of my first term we'll be largely out of there.

O'DONNELL: Asked about recent gaffes made on the trail, McCain chalks that up to his unscripted style and constant exposure to the Press. You hear the whispers of the people say could it be age. How do you respond?

MCCAIN: I guess my response is, very seriously, these are tough times in America and in the world. The economy is in worst shape then it's been in for a long time. They need a steady hand at the tiller. That's what I'm going to try to convince them of and I think I can do it.

Olbermann on McCain's Many Iraq Surge Gaffe's (MSNBC 07/24/08 08:36pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: If John McCain starts spitting out these gaffes any more quickly they'll have to make him the host of TV's Greatest Bloopers. Until this week there was not any dispute practically or semantically as to what the surge in Iraq was nor when it began, or who started it. Nor was there any dispute over what was the first major conflict after 9/11, our attack on the Taliban in Afghanistan. Now Senator McCain has insisted everyone else's understanding of the facts of both of these events is wrong and he alone is right. Tuesday night he told CBS that Colonel McFarland was contacted by one of the major Sunni Sheiks, because of the surge we were able to go out and protect that sheik and others and it began the Anbar Awakening. I mean that's just a matter of history. Of course that Sheik was murdered a year later. [...] Then yesterday afternoon in front of the cheese aisle […] he started claiming that the surge is actually the same thing as the entire counterinsurgency operation in Anbar province. […] And now today, […] the Senator further honed his re-definition of what the surge actually is and reassigned the credit for it.

[Clip of CBS McCain Interview] MCCAIN: […] The surge is a strategy. It's political, it's military, it's the troops, it's hold, it's really clear and hold […]

OLBERMANN: […] Also from that CBS interview […]

MCCAIN: […] The consequences of failure and defeat of the United States of America in the first major conflict since 9/11 […]

OLBERMANN: The first major conflict since 9/11 was Iraq? What was Afghanistan? What is Afghanistan, chopped liver?

[...]

EUGENE ROBINSON: I think he does believe what he's saying. [...] I think he really sees Iraq through this kind of prism or context of Vietnam. [...]

OLBERMANN: Yea Iraq as some old guy's second chance at Vietnam in their lifetime has long been philosophical and psychological subject […]

SANJAY GUPTA: […] arguably they're two of the most well-known cancer survivors in the country and […] they're gonna share the stage tonight to talk about cancer. […] We expect to hear some of the most personal accounts of Senator McCain's history of melanoma. As you know, he's had melanoma four times, the most serious of which was in 2000. He still has that swelling on the left side of his face, those scars on the left side of his neck as reminders. [...] Senator McCain's probably going to talk about what he would do as president, if he were president, to address cancer—specifically, clinical trials and smoking cessation or some of the things we know he's pretty passionate about […].

Trump's Immigration Plan Casts Rivals as the Rope in a Tug of War

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Protesters outside the Republican Party Lincoln Day event in Birch Run, Mich., last week, where Donald J. Trump was the keynote speaker. Rebecca Cook/Reuters

By Alan Rappeport

Good Tuesday morning. Cameras and microphones flocked to Donald J. Trump on Monday as he fulfilled his civic responsibilities and reported for jury duty in Manhattan. But it is his strict immigration proposals that continue to gain widespread attention and expose tension in the party over which crucial voting bloc is best to alienate and upset: Mr. Trump's already angry supporters or Hispanics.

Republicans were hoping to leave their immigration woes behind, but six months before the Iowa caucuses, Mr. Trump has made that impossible.

By articulating his policy of rounding up immigrants and building a big wall, Mr. Trump has forced the party to talk about immigration in the terms of its most ardent activists. So much for Republicans wooing Hispanic voters with a more moderate tone.

"Chasing extremists on immigration to win the primary will end the Republican Party's ability to win the general election in 2016, and it will destroy the party," said Kica Matos, a spokeswoman for the Fair Immigration Reform Movement. "If you alienate the fastest-growing voting block in the country you cannot win today, and you cannot survive tomorrow."

Conservatives walk a tightrope in both directions, running the risk of upsetting their base by breaking too far from Mr. Trump, who leads in the polls. But a Gallup survey this month found that just 31 percent of Republicans favor deporting all illegal immigrants — as Mr. Trump wants to do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The tension in the party was evident on Monday when Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey said that Mr. Trump's plan to build a wall "didn't make any sense" and when Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin echoed Mr. Trump's support for ending birthright citizenship, suggesting to Iowans that he had inspired much of Mr. Trump's overall plan.

On Monday evening, Lorella Praeli, the America Latino outreach director for Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign, released a statement linking Mr. Walker to Mr. Trump, and both of them to the rest of the party.

"It is disturbing that Republican presidential candidates continue to embrace extreme anti-immigrant positions as core pieces of their immigration platform," Ms. Praeli said.

As Mrs. Clinton heads to Nevada on Tuesday to meet with members of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., she will most likely be eager to resume the debate.

What We're Watching Today

- Jeb Bush will attend a national security forum in South Carolina hosted by Americans for Peace, Prosperity and Security. Mr. Bush, who has been lagging in the polls despite his presumed front-runner status when he entered the race, regained some national attention with recent speeches linking the rise of the Islamic State to the policies of President Obama and Mrs. Clinton's tenure as secretary of state.

- The Des Moines Register's Soapbox continues as Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Gov. John R. Kasich of Ohio take their turn with the bipartisan, and sometimes vocal , crowd at the Iowa State Fair.

- And Mrs. Clinton's appearance before labor leaders in Nevada is the latest round in the Democratic fight for the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s endorsement, which the group has hinted it will take its time announcing — a seeming effort for leverage to influence the eventual Democratic nominee's policy positions.

Walker to Release Plan on Repealing and Replacing Health Care Law

Mr. Walker, who is seeking to re-enter the national conversation after slipping poll numbers and a lackluster outing in the first Republican debate, will tackle a subject on Tuesday that many of his rivals have so far ducked: a detailed replacement for Mr. Obama's health care plan.

In a speech in Minnesota, Mr. Walker plans to take aim at the Republican-controlled Congress for failing to "put a bill on President Obama's desk to repeal Obamacare," according to a preview of his remarks.

Still, many who follow Republican proposals for replacing the Affordable Care Act will find the details of Mr. Walker's Patient Freedom Plan familiar. It eliminates the individual mandate to buy health insurance and gives individuals tax credits to buy coverage, up to $3,000 for someone over 50. It allows plans to be sold across state lines. It promises tort reform.

Mr. Walker would revamp two of the Affordable Care Act's most popular features: Instead of requiring insurance companies to allow people up to 26 years old to stay on their parents' plans, states would decide the matter; and instead of a prohibition on insurers discriminating against people with pre-existing conditions, Mr. Walker would give federal aid to states for high-risk pools.

He would pay for his own plan by lowering the cost of Medicaid, largely by turning it into a block grant to states, and by ending the tax deduction for costly employer-provided plans.

An issue Mr. Walker does not address: How many of the estimated 16.5 million people who gained coverage under the law would lose it under repeal, and how many would be covered under the Walker proposals?

Bulletins: Context for Trump; Backing for Kasich; Megadonor for Cruz

- Though Mr. Trump's immigration plan stretched the boundaries of previous conservative platforms, some of his proposals are based on assertions that have been broadly debunked.

- Mr. Kasich is seen as a moderate in the Republicans' rambunctious field of candidates, but the governor of one of the country's most conservative states, Robert Bentley of Alabama, gave him his endorsement on Monday , providing a potential boon to Mr. Kasich's perceived bona fides.

- And Senator Ted Cruz of Texas's team has confirmed the identity of a previously mysterious megadonor: Ben Nash, the chief executive of PCS Wireless, who donated $250,000 to the Stand for Principle PAC tied to Mr. Cruz.

Senate Republicans Reach Outside Senate to Twist Arms on Iran

With August past its midpoint, Senate Republicans are stepping up the pressure on Democrats in advance of the September debate over the Iran nuclear agreement . And not just on the Democrats currently serving in the Senate.

"Will These Democrats Side With President Obama or the American People?" asked the headline of a news statement issued on Monday by the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

In addition to three House members seeking Senate seats in Florida and Illinois, the release singles out other potential Democratic Senate challengers, including Ted Strickland in Ohio and Catherine Cortez Masto in Nevada, and accuses them of being evasive on the Iran deal. The Republicans also pointedly note that Senator Chuck Schumer of New York, the presumed leader of the next crop of Senate Democrats, has come out against the deal.

The Democratic Senate contenders say they are still studying the deal, and they seem in no hurry to go public with their views despite Republican attempts to smoke out even the Democrats who won't have to vote on the deal. But the push by Republicans is evidence that they see their virtually united opposition to the Iran agreement as a political winner and that they intend to make the issue central to the 2016 Senate campaign season.

- In an interview with The New York Times magazine, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont discussed the Black Lives Matter movement, Mr. Trump’s ascent, and his “elevator pitch for Socialism.”

- Writing for CNN, Martin O’Malley, the former Maryland governor, offered a plan to address the cholera epidemic in Haiti, arguing that the United Nations should acknowledge its role in the outbreak — it has been tied to peacekeeping troops — and that “the United States must assume a greater leadership role in our own hemisphere.”

Subject: Re: Iraqi-Kurdish refugee intro at Marguerite Thompson's house

Dear John,

I hope that this message finds you well.

I also been meaning to follow-up with you about the campaign from a MENA policy perspective, specifically anti-ISIS and preventing extremism, but I believe it's even more timely now, given situation in Iraq, Turkey's events, and Russia's involvement.

I just got back from Iraqi Kurdistan (aka KRG area) two weeks ago. The situation was already dire with economic burden of ISIS and refugees on one hand (mostly Arab Sunni) and the inability of the government to engage young people either in the economy or in the state/democracy. Now mass protests and strikes are on, turning violent. The concern is that it could easily go out of hand and destabilize the region, counter to US interests and the fight against ISIS, if the KRG does not listen to some of the basic demands (e.g. salaries haven't been paid in 3 months) and embark on a comprehensive youth engagement PR, strategy, and services. However, the issue is broader than that as a complementary development and youth engagement approach is needed by the US in the whole region, or else we'll always have to be on the defense.

Because of my unique background as Iraqi Kurdish asylum to US in 1996, ex USAID Middle East Bureau senior advisor, and networks in US and there, I believe I can help, short-term and long-term. My work is building stability and preventing extremism through youth engagement and entrepreneurship. I'm aiming to start assessments, partnerships, strategy, and solutions for youth engagement in economy and society. And I believe when I'm able to gain support to work there, part of the work should include assessing and addressing drivers of youth migration, disenfranchisement, and support to terrorism (sympathy, financing, or joining). KRG's stability and success is critical to regional security and fighting ISIS. And that cannot be done without addressing youth (2/3rd of population below 30) and the economy of KRG or the region.

I'd love your thoughts, to talk more about the campaign, and any introductions to colleagues you think appropriate in USG or outside . I can share more info as well.

Looking forward t hear from you,

And all the best,

Rebeen

It is so inspiring to be part of this movement to get Hillary elected, something I've been dreaming of since my family and I were evacuated to the US by President Clinton after my father was assassinated by Saddam's regime in front of our eyes. back from WHO & UNDP in Iraq.

I meant to write immediately last weekend, but unfortunately had a shoulder injury just the next day, and I'm just recovering from it (and the anti-inflammatory medicines). But I did make it to the event with Robby last night, and I was glad to be part of that support platform, and also meet Amanda in person, with whom I'm following up to work on Virginia diaspora relations for the campaign. I'm currently working on a few startups and new NGOs, one of them on countering extremism through youth engagement, entrepreneurship, and economic growth in Iraq, and the other two across global LGBT civil society capacity building, and HIV vaccine.

I know you're quite busy and I'm just happy to have met you after so many years of professionally stalking your work in service of our country and also CAP--a place I would love to be a part of some day--but I do hope to keep in touch and see you and talk more about how I can help now with fundraising, comms, and operations and later with Middle East, global health, and inclusive economic growth.

Hillary moneyman highlights new Saudi connection

The Saudi government, under increasing criticism over civilian casualties from its airstrikes in Yemen and a harsh crackdown on political dissidents at home, has just hired a powerhouse Washington, D.C., lobbying firm headed by a top Hillary Clinton fundraiser — an arrangement that critics charge raises fresh questions about the influence that foreign government lobbyists could have on her campaign.

The Saudi contract with the Podesta Group, owned by veteran Washington lobbyist and Clinton campaign bundler Tony Podesta, calls for the firm to provide “public relations” and other services on behalf of the royal court of King Salman.

It included an initial “project fee” payment of $200,000 last month and unspecified further sums over the course of the next year, according to documents recently filed with the Justice Department Foreign Agents Registration Act office.

The retention comes at a time the Saudis are being condemned by United Nations officials over reports that its bombings against Houthi strongholds in Yemen’s civil war has resulted in the deaths and injuries of hundreds of innocent civilians, including children.

Adding to the international pressure, the Saudis are also facing criticism from human rights groups over its continued refusal to allow basic rights to women (e.g. the freedom to drive cars). They are also being criticized for their hardline domestic suppression of political dissidents, with draconian punishments such as the sentence — by beheading — recently given to a 20-year-old Shiite political protester.

“They are very nervous about an American policy change, and so they are betting on the horse they think will win — Hillary Clinton,” said Ali Al-Ahmad, a Saudi analyst with the Institute for Gulf Affairs, and a frequent critic of the regime, about the hiring of the Podesta Group.

The Podesta Group is now on a roster of a half-dozen D.C. lobbying firms representing the Saudis, including the giant international law firm of DLA Piper and the firm of Hogan Lovells, whose principal on the Saudi account is former Minnesota Republican Sen. Norm Coleman, who chairs the Congressional Leadership Fund, a super-Pac that is a major source of House GOP campaign funds. (Former Texas congressman Tom Loeffler, a top bundler for Jeb Bush’s presidential campaign, for years representedthe Saudis, but his current firm, Akin Gump, now lobbies for the United Arab Emirates, among other foreign clients.)

But the retention of the Podesta Group has gotten attention in Washington lobbying circles because of its unusually close ties to Hillary Clinton’s campaign: Tony Podesta is the brother and former business partner of Clinton’s campaign chairman, John Podesta. He is also a prolific Democratic Party fundraiser who is among 43

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington lobbyists (many of whom also represent foreign governments) listed as Clinton campaign bundlers in reports filed by the campaign with the Federal Election Commission.

The reports disclose that Podesta had raised $140,175 for the Clinton campaign through Sept. 30. Two weeks ago, just days after filing its Saudi contract with the Justice Department, Podesta held a Clinton campaign fundraiser at his home that offered fine Italian food cooked by five gourmet chefs, including himself and his brother, the campaign chairman.

The Podesta Group point man on the Saudi account is David Adams, who previously served as assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs in 2011 and 2012, making him Clinton's chief Capitol Hill lobbyist for her last two years as secretary of state, according to Justice Department filings reviewed by Yahoo News.

But Tony Podesta, while calling himself "a proud Clinton bundler," vigorously denied that the Saudi contract had anything to do with his efforts to elect her president. "I've never had a conversation with Hillary Clinton or anybody in the campaign about the work of the firm," Podesta said, when reached by Yahoo News on his cell phone while he was dining at a restaurant in Sicily. "We represent a dozen foreign governments around the world — we do good work for them. And it has nothing to do with the Hillary Clinton campaign."

Asked for comment, Clinton campaign spokesman Josh Schwerin emailed: "Hillary Clinton has a strong record of standing up for human rights, and has spent her career fighting for women and girls around the world. She's proven that she cannot be intimidated — let alone influenced — to sacrifice these core principles. And so as president she will continue to stand up to countries like Saudi Arabia that don't allow women to have equality. … Make no mistake, when it comes to U.S. national security, she is guided only by the best interests of our country."

The Saudis have longstanding ties to the Clintons: The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is among the largest donors to the Clinton Foundation, contributing between $10 million and $25 million, according to the foundation's website (which only discloses figures in broad categories, not precise sums.) Bill Clinton has also received hefty fees for speeches in Saudi Arabia, including $600,000 for two talks while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state. Last September 4, Bill Clinton met with King Salman for what was described by one source as a "brief courtesy visit" at the Four Seasons Hotel. Two weeks later, on Sept. 18, the Podesta Group filed papers with the Justice Department reporting that it had been retained by an entity called "the Center for Studies and Media Affairs at the Saudi Royal Court."

Podesta said he was "unaware" of the Four Seasons hotel meeting between the King and the former president and that his negotiations to represent the Saudis had been going on for several months before that. He declined, however, to talk about precisely what his firm had been retained to do for the Saudis. "We don't speak on or off the record about what we do for our clients," he said.

Podesta is far from the only Clinton campaign bundler to be lobbying for foreign governments or their interests. A review of the Clinton campaign's bundler list by Yahoo News found lobbyists representing the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, South Korea, Morocco, Japan, and Hong Kong. (Bush, who among GOP candidates has the most entrenched ties to K Street, received bundled contributions from lobbyists with firms that represent the People's Republic of China, Turkey, and South Korea.)

Two of the Clinton lobbyist-bundlers, Richard Sullivan and David Jones, are principals in a firm that, until late last year, represented the Russia Direct Investment Fund, a sovereign wealth fund co-founded by Vladimir Putin when he was prime minister. Another Clinton campaign bundler, former New Jersey Sen. Robert Torricelli, is the lobbyist for the Paris-based National Council for Resistance in Iran, a controversial Iranian dissident group that for years had been on the State Department's terrorism list, but was "de-listed" three years ago.

In her campaign, Hillary Clinton has pledged to push for sweeping campaign finance reform that will "end the stranglehold that wealthy interests have over our political system" and "curb the outsized influence of big money in American politics." But the role of so many well-heeled foreign lobbyists in Clinton's campaign fundraising apparatus is “very troubling” and represents a substantial retreat from eight years ago, when then candidate Barack Obama refused to take campaign money at all from any registered lobbyists, said Craig Holman of Public Citizen, a public interest group that has long pushed for wholesale changes in the campaign-finance system.

“This is classic influence-peddling,” said Holman

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Civil war makes Ben Carson's campaign chaotic

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA: A long-simmering battle between Ben Carson's business manager and his campaign manager is coming to a head.

— Many who supported Ben Carson in the fall are backing Ted Cruz in the winter. The retired neurosurgeon has plummeted in the polls since coming under the white hot spotlight of media scrutiny. The aftermath of the Paris attacks highlighted his lack of foreign policy experience. The soft-spoken, mild-mannered temperament that the conservative base once found so appealing no longer fits the angry mood of the moment.

— Looking to revive his flagging campaign, Carson told The Post in an interview yesterday that he is going to make changes. "I'm looking at every aspect of the campaign right now," he told Robert Costa and Jose A. DelReal. "Everything is on the table, every job is on the table. And we're going to analyze it very carefully." He added that he wanted to more efficiently spend money and that he would ask staff to take pay cuts.

— What happened next did not exactly leave the impression that Carson is getting his operation under control:

- Carson declined during the sit-down in his basement – he was alone and unstaffed – to say whether campaign manager Barry Bennett would remain in charge.
- A few hours later, the campaign distributed a statement that quoted Carson saying all of his senior advisers would remain in place "with my full confidence."
- Then Carson went on CNN in the 10 p.m. hour to criticize The Post's story, calling it overhyped "sensationalism," even though it was based on a recorded interview. "They were convinced that I was gonna fire everybody and we were going to just go in a completely different direction, and that's absolutely not true," he told host Don Lemon. Carson walked back his comments about an impending shake-up: "The key word there is 'may.' We're always going to be looking at it. … No one is ever 100 percent guaranteed that they're always going to be there."

— Sources tell Bob and Jose that Carson has been interviewing consultants for prominent roles in the campaign without Bennett's knowledge. Armstrong Williams, who has been Carson's longtime business manager and is not formally part of the campaign, has battled Bennett over strategy and messaging. Both Williams and Bennett often communicate directly to Carson with competing messages.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Late last night, the two rivals offered contradictory messages about the status of the campaign:

- “We had our standard 3:30 p.m. call and I asked him about the story. He said he has 100 percent faith in the team,” Bennett said.
- “Take what the candidate said to you, in his home and on his invitation, seriously,” Williams said. “That is what he said and what he believes.”

— When you run for the House or seek statewide office, you learn a lot about how campaigns work. When you try to start in politics with a presidential campaign, standard rookie mistakes – like not dealing well with conflicting advice and not having clearly delineated lines of authority – get magnified. Dwight Eisenhower was our last president who had never held elected office before seeking the presidency, but he had commanded the Allied invasion on D-Day.

— First-time candidates are also more likely to think the problem is staff, not themselves: During the interview with my colleagues, the doctor said that some unnamed aides keep pleading with him to be more bombastic and to go after Trump and Cruz more forcefully. He said he won’t do it. “That’s just not who I am,” he said.

— The Department of Homeland Security has begun preparing for a series of raids that will target for deportation hundreds of families who have flocked to the United States since the start of last year, Jerry Markon and David Nakamura scoop .

- “The nationwide campaign, to be carried out by ICE agents as soon as early January, would be the first large-scale effort to deport families who have fled violence in Central America … More than 100,000 families with both adults and children have made the journey across the southwest border since last year.”
- “The proposed deportations have been controversial inside the Obama administration, which has been discussing them for several months. DHS Secretary Jeh Johnson has been pushing for the moves … in part because of a new spike in the number of illegal immigrants in recent months.”
- “Experts say that the violence that was a key factor in driving people to flee Central America last year has surged again, with the homicide rate in El Salvador reaching its highest level in a generation. A drought in the region has also prompted departures.”

— Shadow-boxing Hillary, Bernie trashes Rahm in Chicago: Sanders said during a visit to Chicago that, if he becomes the party's nominee, he could make do without the support of Rahm Emanuel, the city's embattled mayor and a confidant to the Clintons. "If the question is do I want or need Rahm Emanuel's support for president, with all due respect for the mayor, no I don't," Sanders said. John Wagner reports from the Windy City that "Chuy" Garcia, who lost to Emanuel in a mayoral runoff in April, appeared with Sanders on stage. When a reporter asked about Rahm, Sanders pointed to Garcia. "This was my guy," he said.

- Emanuel continues to brush off calls for his resignation over his botched handling of a police shooting of an unarmed 17-year-old. He says dashcam video of the 2014 incident was not publicly released until after he was reelected because of a pending legal case.
- One young man who stood behind Sanders on stage last night wore a T-shirt that said, "Rahm failed us."

— CNN/ORC's poll of the Democratic contest finds Hillary expanding her lead in the wake of last weekend's debate. Clinton leads 50-34 nationally, down from 58-30 in the same poll last month. "But those overall results mask a shift back toward Clinton following the debate," says CNN pollster Jennifer Agiesta. "In interviews conducted before the debate, Sanders ran closer to Clinton, with 37% support to Clinton's 45%. Among those interviewed after the debate, Clinton's lead grew to 60% vs. Sanders' 27%." The former secretary of state tops Sanders 72-15 on who is best to handle foreign policy and 63-18 on who is best to face ISIS. (Check the crosstabs here.)

THE WORLD IS A VERY SCARY PLACE THIS CHRISTMAS EVE:

Pastor Su, a protestant preacher from Guiyang, China, reads the Bible on his iPhone.

Pastor Su's Church, Living Stone, was recently shuttered in a sweeping crackdown on Dec. 21. Seeking comfort, Su turns to scripture: "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose." That's Romans 2:28. (Photo by Emily Rauhala/TWP)

A real war on Christmas! –> "Christians in CHINA feel full force of authorities' repression," by Emily Rauhala: "The slight and soft-spoken Protestant preacher is no stranger to surveillance. Su Tianfu has worked for years in China's unregistered 'house churches,' and he said he has been interrogated more times than he can count. But even Su is surprised by what has happened in Guiyang this month: a crackdown that has led to the shuttering of the thriving Living Stone Church, the detention of a pastor on charges of 'possessing state secrets' and the shadowing of dozens of churchgoers by police. A local government directive leaked to China Aid, a Texas-based Christian group, and reviewed by The Washington Post advises local Communist Party cadres that shutting down the church is necessary to 'maintain social stability'— a catchall phrase often used to justify sweeping clampdowns. The Dec. 9 raid on the church in a relatively sleepy provincial capital is conspicuous because of the timing — about two weeks before Christmas — and because the government's tactics were revealed."

— Violence in the West Bank makes for a quiet Christmas in BETHLEHEM this year. "The city celebrated as the birthplace of Jesus is usually filled with parades and parties this time of year. This year? It's not exactly like Christmas was canceled, but it is a somber, dutiful affair," William Booth, our man in Israel, reports.

- "It's a sad Christmas to be honest," said Nabil Giacaman, a Palestinian Christian and owner of a souvenir shop, who a few days before the holiday hadn't bothered to decorate his store. "I'm just not in the mood."
- "The Palestinian leadership decided to tone down the celebrations this year out of respect for the dead."
- Plenty of room at the inns: "The number of tourists to Bethlehem in October and November were half the number of previous years."

— ISIS is aggressively trying to build a branch in SOMALIA, more than 2,000 miles from Syria. "Winning ground there won't be easy," our Kevin Sieff reports from Nairobi. "Al-Shabab, a Somali group linked to al-Qaeda, has a long-standing presence in the country at Africa's eastern edge. It has threatened those who join the Islamic State with death. But that hasn't stopped a trickle of fighters — likely a few dozen — from switching sides, raising concerns among U.S. officials … Somalia holds potentially huge rewards for the extremist group: It is a marginally governed nation with the continent's longest coastline, bordering three U.S. allies — Ethiopia, Djibouti and Kenya."

An oil pump in Venezuela, a U.S. adversary that has been weakened by the falling oil prices/ (Reuters/Isaac Urrutia)

Another upside of cheap gas! –> "Obama's foreign policy goals get a boost from plunging oil prices," by Steven Mufson: "Plunging crude oil prices are diverting hundreds of billions of dollars away from the treasure chests of oil-exporting nations, putting some of the United States' adversaries under greater stress. After two years of falling prices, the effects have reverberated across the globe, fueling economic discontent in Venezuela, changing Russia's economic and political calculations, and dampening Iranian leaders' hopes of a financial windfall when sanctions linked to its nuclear program will be lifted next year. At a time of tension for U.S. international relations, cheap oil has dovetailed with some of the Obama administration's foreign policy goals — pressuring Russian President Vladimir Putin, undermining the popularity of Venezuelan President Nicolás Maduro and tempering the prospects for Iranian oil revenue."

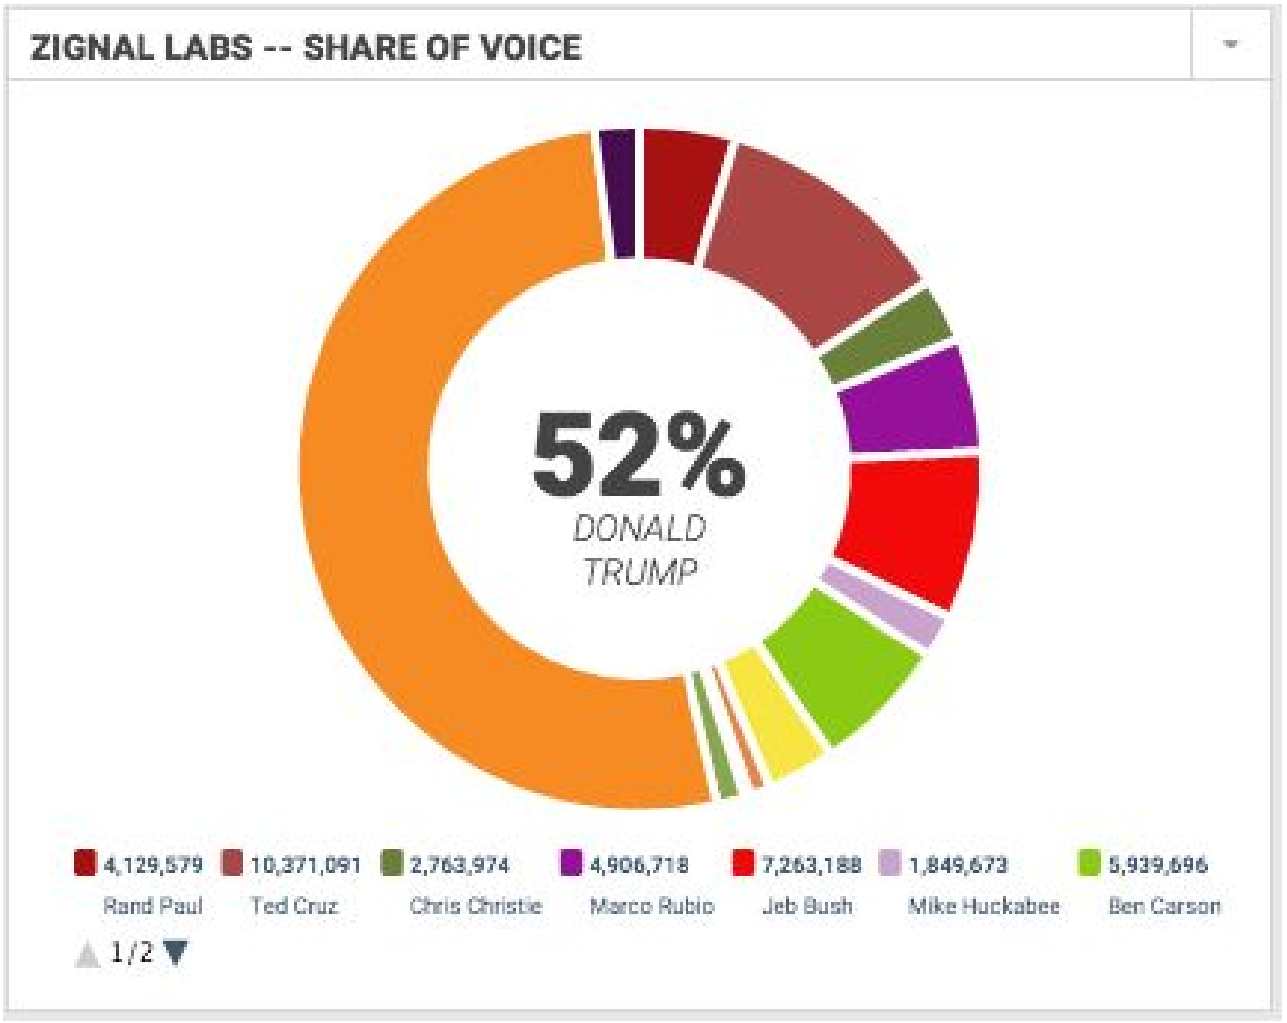
Weldon Angelos is serving a 55-year prison sentence for selling marijuana while having a gun. (Photo by Nikki Kahn/The Washington Post)

— POTUS signed 95 commutations last Friday, but many who have been treated unjustly by the justice system — victims of the war on drugs' excesses — remain behind bars. Sari Horwitz tells one such story this morning:



"Obama's clemency list brings joy to the lucky and anguish to the disappointed": "The booming voice of a prison official called an inmate to the main office. About 25 minutes later, the official came on the intercom again, summoning another prisoner. Weldon Angelos knew exactly what was happening. The prisoners had heard a rumor the night before that President Obama might grant early release to certain drug offenders before he left Washington for the holidays. Angelos was excited, anxious. This was it. The lucky inmates on Obama's list were being called inside to take phone calls from their attorneys, who would tell them the good news. After the two inmates were called, the minutes ticked past 30, then 45, and the intercom remained silent. 'I felt sick,' said Angelos, 36, who is serving a 55-year sentence for selling about $1,000 worth of marijuana. 'It was devastating.' And for Angelos and his supporters, that is the cruelty of the clemency process set up by the Obama administration to give relief to drug offenders who received harsh sentences over the past couple of decades in the nation's war on drugs."

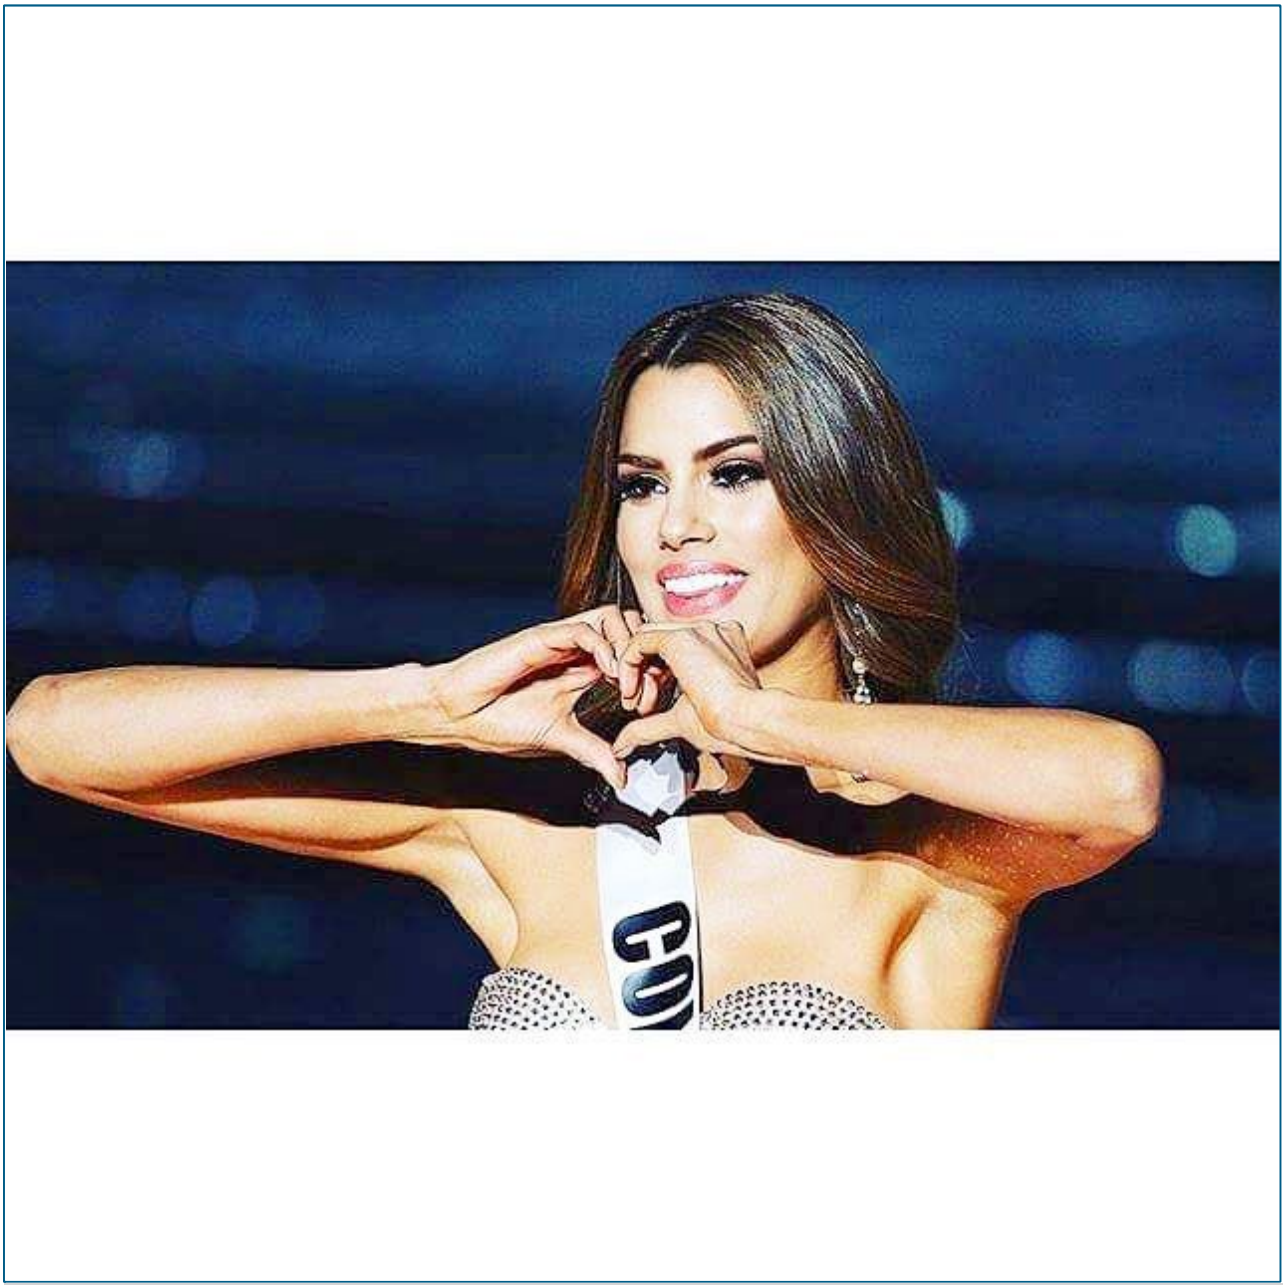
George F. Will writes in his column today that he's becoming even more alarmed about Trump: "In 2016, a Trump nomination would not just mean another Democratic presidency. It would also mean the loss of what Taft and then Goldwater made possible — a conservative party as a constant presence in U.S. politics. … It is possible Trump will not win any primary, and that by the middle of March our long national embarrassment will be over. But this avatar of unfettered government and executive authoritarianism has mesmerized a large portion of Republicans for six months. The larger portion should understand this: One hundred and four years of history is in the balance. If Trump is the Republican nominee in 2016, there might not be a conservative party in 2020 either."

David Weigel argues that Trump is basically mimicking the SHOCK JOCK model that thrived after the FCC stopped enforcing the Fairness Doctrine in 1987: "Whether he moves to the White House or returns to Mar-a-Largo, Trump's campaign has challenged and changed the way politics is covered. Political media have adapted slowly, treating nearly every Trump eruption as a gaffe — the kind a normal politician might make on his way to defeat. The world of talk radio never saw Trump this way, because the phenomenon ran through it more than a generation ago."



Humorist Dave Barry calls 2015 "the worst year ever" in his annual Year in Review column: "Are we saying it was worse than, for example, 1347, the year when the bubonic plague killed a large part of humanity? Yes, we are saying that. Because at least the remainder of humanity was not exposed to a solid week in which the news media focused intensively on the question of whether a leading candidate for president of the United States had, or had not, made an explicit reference to a prominent female TV journalist's biological lady cycle. That actually happened in 2015, and it was not the only bad thing."

Hillary at a town hall in Mason City, Iowa (AP Photo/Charlie Neibergall)

— New York Times, "Hillary Clinton seizes on Trump's remarks to galvanize women," by Amy Chozick and Maggie Haberman: "Behind the scenes, the Clinton campaign mobilized a wide network of female supporters to denounce Mr. Trump as 'sexist,' as a practitioner of 'pathetic, frat-boy politics,' and as more suited to running for 'president of the fourth-grade football team.'

- A strategy shift: "For months, Mrs. Clinton's strategy was to hang Mr. Trump's more outrageous pronouncements around the necks of other Republican contenders, seeking to portray the party's entire field as extreme. But by going after Mr. Trump more assertively now than most of his Republican rivals have dared, Mrs. Clinton is projecting strength, and she is calculating that women, especially young voters, will reward her."
- In an interview with The Des Moines Register late Tuesday, she said of Trump, "It's not the first time he's demonstrated a penchant for sexism."
- Combativeness plays into the Clinton campaign theme: "The blue 'Hillary' signs that blanket her rallies carry the slogan 'Fighting for us' in big block letters. But poking Mr. Trump is not risk-free. He is unlike any rival Mrs. Clinton has confronted before, and has proved willing to say almost anything."

— Wall Street Journal, "U.S. pursued secret contacts with Assad regime for years," by Nour Malas and Carol E. Lee: "The Obama administration pursued secret communications with elements of Syria's regime over several years in a failed attempt to limit violence and get President Bashar al-Assad to relinquish power, according to U.S. and Arab officials. Early on, the U.S. looked for cracks in the regime it could exploit to encourage a military coup, but found few … Unlike the secret White House back channel to Iran, however, the Syria effort never gained momentum and communication was limited … At times, senior officials spoke directly to each other and at others, they sent messages through intermediaries such as Mr. Assad's main allies Russia and Iran."

— New Hampshire Public Radio, "In N.H. Primary, North Country campaign stops are few and far between," by Dan Barrick: "Northern New Hampshire has seen little of the presidential candidates this year. Of the nearly 850 campaign stops by candidates of both parties across the state since May, just 39 have taken place north of the White Mountains. That scarcity is largely due to demographics. Most of New Hampshire's residents live in the densely populated Southern Tier, the wedge stretching south from Manchester and east towards the Seacoast. By contrast, just 2 percent of New Hampshire residents call the North Country home … But Northern New Hampshire is more than just a more forested, less-populated version of the state as a whole. The issues and challenges facing residents there differ significantly from the rest of the state. The region's residents are, generally speaking, older, poorer and less educated than folks in the southern part of New Hampshire."

— Politico, "Donald Trump's gender gap, " by Steven Shepard: "On the surface, it doesn't appear that Trump's gendered attacks have damaged his candidacy throughout his 6-month-old presidential campaign. Trump remains not just the national front-runner — he's also ahead in many of the key early-nominating states. But Trump's current coalition in the primaries relies heavily on male voters — especially less-educated men. The female vote is less important in Republican primaries — where, because women are more likely than men to be Democrats, they make up a minority of the electorate — and a candidate who appeals mostly to working-class males can emerge in a fractured field. … Fully 74 percent of non-college men who identify as Republicans or Republican-leaning independents have a favorable impression of Trump, compared with 57 percent of male college graduates. Those numbers drop off among women. The poll found that 50 percent of female college graduates have a favorable view of the real estate mogul. And there's less of a difference across the education level — just 51 percent of female non-college graduates say they look upon Trump favorably."

Also now under seal: A Nov. 17, 2014, note, seized by the military, from the alleged plot mastermind to another captive with advice on how to handle the female guard flap at the Pentagon's most clandestine prison. The decision to deny the public access to the documents — which for a time appeared illegibly in the court record — follows the Pentagon's likewise blacking out wide swaths of a transcript of an open hearing on the same topic … A prosecutor referred to a March 2014 letter from alleged plot deputy Ramzi bin al Shibh to the then commander of the lockup, a female officer. They also suggested Kerry is reneging on the terms of the visa waiver law that were closely negotiated between Congress and the Obama administration."

Under House energy bill, coal won't be going away

A proposal to limit greenhouse gas emissions makes concessions to the industry in effort to attract support from congressional Democrats who represent coal-dependent areas.
By Jim Tankersley

June 22, 2009

Reporting from Washington — Coal-fired power plants are the largest source of heat-trapping gases that cause global warming, but President Obama's plan to fight climate change would result in the nation burning more coal a decade from now than it does today.

The administration's plan, the centerpiece of a 700-page legislative package , proposes strict limits on emissions of greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide.

But to attract vital support from congressional Democrats representing heavily coal-dependent areas, authors of the legislation, including Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Beverly Hills), have made a series of concessions that substantially soften its effect on coal -- at least over the next decade or so.

As a result, the Environmental Protection Agency projects that even if the emissions limits go into effect, the U.S. would use more carbon-dioxide-heavy coal in 2020 than it did in 2005.

That's because the bill gives utilities a financial incentive to keep burning coal by joining the cap-and-trade system -- a kind of marketplace where polluters could reduce their emissions on paper by buying pollution reductions created by others. These so-called offsets, for example, could be created and sold by farmers who planted trees, which filter carbon dioxide from the atmosphere.

Environmental groups also say the bill could set off a boom in the construction of new coal plants because of provisions that would restrict legal efforts to block such projects.

Leading Democrats -- and some major conservation groups, such as the Natural Resources Defense Council -- say the moves have helped attract coal-district Democrats to support the bill without undermining the plan's environmental goals.

"We've ensured a role for coal" in the nation's energy future, said Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.), one of the leading coal champions in the House.

But some environmentalists remain skeptical that offsets can reduce greenhouse gases to avoid catastrophic warming of the atmosphere.

"This is greens making a deal with the devil," said Ted Nordhaus, chairman of the Breakthrough Institute, an environmentalist think tank that recently completed a detailed critique of the bill's coal provisions .

Obama and House leaders "gave the coal guys everything they wanted," said Michael Shellenberger, the institute's president. "The result is legislation that, when all is said and done, will increase coal generation and make it harder to move away from it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The EPA projects Obama's plan would slow the growth in coal over what would have occurred in the absence of emission limits. Emissions from coal would grow at roughly the same rate as overall coal use, until "clean coal" technology becomes commercially viable.

Under the plan, the EPA projects that after 2020, conventional coal use would begin to fall quickly. That prediction rests on a still-uncertain assumption that new nuclear power plants would begin to come on line.

The analysis also assumes scientists will master advanced technologies that could make coal more attractive from an emissions standpoint. As of now, no one has on a commercial scale.

Obama's Energy Department announced this month that it would spend more than $1 billion to restart a carbon-capture demonstration plant in Mattoon, Ill.

The focus on coal in climate legislation is directly linked to its abundance. Coal has been burned for heat since the time of cavemen. It stoked the smokestacks of the Industrial Revolution and powered the first steam engines. It remains the source of half of the electric power in the United States and is the nation's most abundant fossil fuel.

"Whatever the ideal vision of the future," said David G. Hawkins, director of climate programs for the NRDC, "coal will be there for decades at least."

The coal industry spent $38 million in the 2008 presidential campaign to push its message, and it has succeeded in changing the nature of the debate.

"In the past, there was a drive to use climate policy as a wedge to take coal out of the energy mix," said Joe Lucas, senior vice president of communications for the industry-funded American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity. "There's just been a fundamental shift."

Several of the most coal-dependent utilities have endorsed the House bill, but the coal coalition has not -- it wants caps on the price of emission permits, among other amendments. But Lucas said the bill was "closer" than it had ever been to industry acceptance.

Still, most Republicans, particularly those from coal-heavy regions, say the bill is still not a good deal for coal consumers, who include many of the poorest Americans.

"Why is it that the wealthy parts of our country continue to attack the lifestyles of the rural poor?" Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), a longtime coal champion, asked at a hearing on the energy bill last month. "If you're going to put a price on carbon emissions now, later or in the future, those that rely on [coal] are going to be harmed."

League of Conservation Voters to Deny Endorsement to Any Member of Congress Who Votes No On American Clean Energy and Security Act

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The League of Conservation Voters (LCV) believes that H.R. 2454, the American Clean Energy and Security Act, is the most important piece of environmental legislation to ever come before the House of Representatives. The historic bill has the potential to transform America by creating clean energy jobs, improving our national security, and protecting our planet from global warming pollution.

In light of the tremendous importance of this legislation, LCV has made the unprecedented decision that the organization will not endorse any member of the House of Representatives in the 2010 election cycle who votes against final passage of this bill. Every Member of Congress received a letter informing them of this policy and LCV's strong support for H.R.2454 on Tuesday, June 23.

"The stakes could not be higher; a safer, healthier planet and a new energy economy hang in the balance, and it's imperative that members of Congress be on the right side of history," LCV President Gene Karpinski said in the letter to the House.

In 2006 and 2008, LCV endorsed 155 federal candidates, of whom 124 won election or reelection (number includes Al Franken). LCV's endorsement is a nationally recognized shorthand that gives candidates for federal office legitimacy with environmental voters and donors. As always, LCV will consider many other factors, including viability, vulnerability, recent and lifetime LCV scores, and demonstrated environmental leadership, in our final endorsement decisions.

Prepared Transcript:

Thank you. The hectic but repetitive routine of presidential campaigns often seems to consist entirely of back and forth charges between candidates, punctuated by photo ops, debates and the occasional policy speech, followed by another barrage of accusations and counter accusations, formulated into the soundbites preferred by cable news producers. It is a little hypocritical for candidates or reporters to criticize these deficiencies. They are our creation. Campaigns and the media collaborated as architects of the modern presidential campaign, and we deserve equal blame for the regret we feel from time to time over its less than inspirational features.

Voters, however, even in this revolutionary communications age, with its 24 hour news cycle, can be forgiven their uncertainty about what the candidates actually hope to achieve if they have the extraordinary privilege of being elected President of the United States. We spend too little time and offer too few specifics on that most important of questions. We make promises, of course, about what kind of policies we would pursue in office. But they often are obscured, mischaracterized and forgotten in the heat and fog of political battle.

Next January, the political leadership of the United States will change significantly. It is important that the candidates who seek to lead the country after the Bush Administration define their objectives and what they plan to achieve not with vague language but with clarity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So, what I want to do today is take a little time to describe what I would hope to have achieved at the end of my first term as President. I cannot guarantee I will have achieved these things. I am presumptuous enough to think I would be a good President, but not so much that I believe I can govern by command. Should I forget that, Congress will, of course, hasten to remind me. The following are conditions I intend to achieve. And toward that end, I will focus all the powers of the office; every skill and strength I possess; and seize every opportunity to work with members of Congress who put the national interest ahead of partisanship, and any country in the world that shares our hopes for a more peaceful and prosperous world.

By January 2013, America has welcomed home most of the servicemen and women who have sacrificed terribly so that America might be secure in her freedom. The Iraq War has been won. Iraq is a functioning democracy, although still suffering from the lingering effects of decades of tyranny and centuries of sectarian tension. Violence still occurs, but it is spasmodic and much reduced. Civil war has been prevented; militias disbanded; the Iraqi Security Force is professional and competent; al Qaeda in Iraq has been defeated; and the Government of Iraq is capable of imposing its authority in every province of Iraq and defending the integrity of its borders. The United States maintains a military presence there, but a much smaller one, and it does not play a direct combat role.

The threat from a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan has been greatly reduced but not eliminated. U.S. and NATO forces remain there to help finish the job, and continue operations against the remnants of al Qaeda. The Government of Pakistan has cooperated with the U.S. in successfully adapting the counterinsurgency tactics that worked so well in Iraq and Afghanistan to its lawless tribal areas where al Qaeda fighters are based. The increase in actionable intelligence that the counterinsurgency produced led to the capture or death of Osama bin Laden, and his chief lieutenants. There is no longer any place in the world al Qaeda can consider a safe haven. Increased cooperation between the United States and its allies in the concerted use of military, diplomatic, and economic power and reforms in the intelligence capabilities of the United States has disrupted terrorist networks and exposed plots around the world. There still has not been a major terrorist attack in the United States since September 11, 2001.

The United States and its allies have made great progress in advancing nuclear security. Concerted action by the great democracies of the world has persuaded a reluctant Russia and China to cooperate in pressuring Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, and North Korea to discontinue its own. The single greatest threat facing the West -- the prospect of nuclear materials in the hands of terrorists -- has been vastly diminished.

The size of the Army and Marine Corps has been significantly increased, and are now better equipped and trained to defend us. Long overdue reforms to the way we acquire weapons programs, including fixed price contracts, have created sufficient savings to pay for a larger military. A substantial increase in veterans educational benefits and improvements in their health care has aided recruitment and retention. The strain on the National Guard and reserve forces has been relieved.

After efforts to pressure the Government in Sudan over Darfur failed again in the U.N. Security Council, the United States, acting in concert with a newly formed League of Democracies, applied stiff diplomatic and economic pressure that caused the government of Sudan to agree to a multinational peacekeeping force, with NATO countries providing logistical and air support, to stop the genocide that had made a mockery of the world's repeated declaration that we would "never again" tolerant such inhumanity. Encouraged by the success, the League is now occupied with using the economic power and prestige of its member states to end other gross abuses of human rights such as the despicable crime of human trafficking.

The United States has experienced several years of robust economic growth, and Americans again have confidence in their economic future. A reduction in the corporate tax rate from the second highest in the world to one on par with our trading partners; the low rate on capital gains; allowing business to deduct in a single year investments in equipment and technology, while eliminating tax loopholes and ending corporate welfare, have spurred innovation and productivity, and encouraged companies to keep their operations and jobs in the United States. The Alternate Minimum Tax is being phased out, with relief provided first to middle income families. Doubling the size of the child exemption has put more disposable income in the hands of taxpayers, further stimulating growth.

Congress has just passed by a single up or down vote a tax reform proposal that offers Americans a choice of continuing to file under the rules of the current complicated and burdensome tax code or use a new, simpler, fairer and flatter tax, with two rates and a generous deduction. Millions of taxpayers are expected to file under the flat tax, and save billions in the cost of preparing their returns.

After exercising my veto several times in my first year in office, Congress has not sent me an appropriations bill containing earmarks for the last three years. A top to bottom review of every federal bureaucracy has yielded great reductions in government spending by identifying programs that serve no important purpose; and instigating far reaching reforms of procurement and operating policies that have for too long extravagantly wasted money for no better purpose than to increase federal payrolls.

New free trade agreements have been ratified and led to substantial increases in both exports and imports. The resulting growth in prosperity in countries from South America to Asia to Africa has greatly strengthened America's security and the global progress of our political ideals. U.S. tariffs on agricultural imports have been eliminated and unneeded farm subsidies are being phased out. The world food crisis has ended, inflation is low, and the quality of life not only in our country, but in some of the most impoverished countries around the world is much improved.

Americans, who through no fault of their own, lost jobs in the global economy they once believed were theirs for life, are assisted by reformed unemployment insurance and worker retraining programs. Older workers who accept lower paying jobs while they acquire new skills are provided assistance to make up a good part of the income they have lost. Community colleges and technical schools all over the country have developed worker retraining programs suited to the specific economic opportunities available in their communities and are helping millions of workers who have lost a job that won't come back find a new one that won't go away.

Public education in the United States is much improved thanks to the competition provided by charter and private schools; the increase of quality teachers through incentives like merit pay and terrific programs that attract to the classroom enthusiastic and innovative teachers from many disciplines, like Teach for America and Troops to Teachers. Educational software and online teaching programs endorsed by qualified non profits are much more widely in use, bringing to the smallest classrooms in America some of the greatest math, English, and science teachers in the country. This revolution in teaching methods has especially benefited rural America. Test scores and graduation rates are rising everywhere in the country.

Health care has become more accessible to more Americans than at any other time in history. Reforms of the insurance market; putting the choice of health care into the hands of American families rather than exclusively with the government or employers; walk in clinics as alternatives to emergency room care; paying for outcome in the treatment of disease rather than individual procedures; and competition in the prescription drug market have begun to wring out the runaway inflation once endemic in our health care system. More small businesses offer their employees health plans. Schools have greatly improved their emphasis on physical education and nutritional content of meals offered in school cafeterias. Obesity rates among the young and the disease they engender are stabilized and beginning to decline. The federal government and states have cooperated in establishing backstop insurance pools that provide coverage to people hard pressed to find insurance elsewhere because of pre-existing illness.

The reduction in the growth of health care costs has begun to relieve some of the pressure on Medicare; encouraging Congress to act in a bipartisan way to extend its solvency for twenty-five years without increasing taxes and raising premiums only for upper income seniors. Their success encouraged a group of congressional leaders from both parties to work with my administration to fix Social Security as well, without reducing benefits to those near retirement. The reforms include some form of personal retirement accounts in safe and reliable index funds, such as have been available to government employees since their retirement plans were made solvent a quarter century ago.

The United States is well on the way to independence from foreign sources of oil; progress that has not only begun to alleviate the environmental threat posed from climate change, but has greatly improved our security as well. A cap and trade system has been implemented, spurring great innovation in the development of green technologies and alternative energy sources. Clean coal technology has advanced considerably with federal assistance. Construction has begun on twenty new nuclear reactors thanks to improved incentives and a streamlined regulatory process.

Scores of judges have been confirmed to the federal district and appellate courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, who understand that they were not sent there to write our laws but to enforce them and make sure they are consistent with the Constitution. They are judges of exceptional character and quality, who enforce and do not make laws, and who respect the values of the people whose rights, laws and property they are sworn to defend.

Border state governors have certified and the American people recognize that after tremendous improvements to border security infrastructure and increases in the border patrol, and vigorous prosecution of companies that employ illegal aliens, our southern border is now secure. Illegal immigrants who broke our laws after they came here have been arrested and deported. Illegal immigration has been finally brought under control, and the American people accepted the practical necessity to institute a temporary worker program and deal humanely with the millions of immigrants who have been in this country illegally.

Voluntary national service has grown in popularity in part because of the educational benefits used as incentives, as well as frequent appeals from the bully pulpit of the White House, but mostly because the young Americans, no less than earlier generations, understand that true happiness is much greater than the pursuit of pleasure, and can only be found by serving causes greater than self-interest. Scores of accomplished private sector leaders have joined the ranks of my administration for a dollar a year and have instituted some of the most innovative reforms of government programs ever known, often in partnership with willing private sector partners. A sense of community, a kinship of ideals, has invigorated public service again.

This is the progress I want us to achieve during my presidency. These are the changes I am running for President to make. I want to leave office knowing that America is safer, freer, and wealthier than when I was elected; that more Americans have more opportunities to pursue their dreams than at any other time in our history; that the world has become less threatening to our interests and more hospitable to our values; and that America has again, as she always has, chosen not to hide from history but to make history.

I am well aware I cannot make any of these changes alone. The powers of the presidency are rightly checked by the other branches of government, and I will not attempt to acquire powers our founders saw fit to grant Congress. I will exercise my veto if I believe legislation passed by Congress is not in the nation's best interests, but I will not subvert the purpose of legislation I have signed by making statements that indicate I will enforce only the parts of it I like. I will respect the responsibilities the Constitution and the American people have granted Congress, and will, as I often have in the past, work with anyone of either party to get things done for our country.

For too long, now, Washington has been consumed by a hyper-partisanship that treats every serious challenge facing us as an opportunity to trade insults; disparage each other's motives; and fight about the next election. For all the problems we face, if you ask Americans what frustrates them most about Washington, they will tell you they don't think we're capable of serving the public interest before our personal and partisan ambitions; that we fight for ourselves and not for them. Americans are sick of it, and they have every right to be. They are sick of the politics of selfishness, stalemate and delay. They despair when every election -- no matter who wins -- always seems to produce four more years of unkept promises and a government that is just a battleground for the next election. Their patience is at an end for politicians who value ambition over principle, and for partisanship that is less a contest of ide as than an uncivil brawl over the spoils of power. They want to change not only the policies and institutions that have failed the American people, but the political culture that produced them. They want to move this country forward and stake our claim on this century as we did in the last. And they want their government to care more about them than preserving the privileges of the powerful.

There are serious issues at stake in this election, and serious differences between the candidates. And we will argue about them, as we should. But it should remain an argument among friends; each of us struggling to hear our conscience, and heed its demands; each of us, despite our differences, united in our great cause, and respectful of the goodness in each other. That is how most Americans treat each other. And it is how they want the people they elect to office to treat each other.

If I am elected President, I will work with anyone who sincerely wants to get this country moving again. I will listen to any idea that is offered in good faith and intended to help solve our problems, not make them worse. I will seek the counsel of members of Congress from both parties in forming government policy before I ask them to support it. I will ask Democrats to serve in my administration. My administration will set a new standard for transparency and accountability. I will hold weekly press conferences. I will regularly brief the American people on the progress our policies have made and the setbacks we have encountered. When we make errors, I will confess them readily, and explain what we intend to do to correct them. I will ask Congress to grant me the privilege of coming before both houses to take questions, and address criticism, much the same as the Prime Minister of Great Britain appears regularly before the House of Commons.

We cannot again leave our problems for another unluckier generation of Americans to fix after they have become even harder to solve. I'm not interested in partisanship that serves no other purpose than to gain a temporary advantage over our opponents. This mindless, paralyzing rancor must come to an end. We belong to different parties, not different countries. We are rivals for the same power. But we are also compatriots. We are fellow Americans, and that shared distinction means more to me than any other association. I intend to prove myself worthy of the office; of our country; and of your respect. I won't judge myself by how many elections I've won. I won't spend one hour of my presidency worrying more about my re-election than keeping my promises to the American people. There is a time to campaign, and a time to govern. If I'm elected President, the era of the permanent campaign will end. The era of problem solving will begin. I promise you, from the day I am sworn into office until the last hour of my presidency, I will work with anyone, of either party, to make this country safe, prosperous and proud. And I won't care who gets the credit. Thank you.

Thank you,

Subject:	[big campaign] Tracking Clip of the Day: McCain flips, now says gas prices will not decrease, due to demand from India and China

Today McCain said that to think price of oil will come down "ignores the reality of two major economies ... competing for a finite resource". Last Thurs, he said he '[did] not recognize that" increased demand from China, etc. will offset gains to be made from offshore drilling. See links and full transcripts below. Enjoy!

McCain: To think price of oil will come down "ignores the reality of two major economies ... competing for a finite resource"
QUESTIONER: Well, I just had a question about the mass transit in this country like high-speed rail, electric, this kind of stuff that families could use to commute east and west, north and south and do it cheaply.

JOHN MCCAIN: "[...] I think what you're doing here [at GE] is a natural extension of what you're going to see as an explosion of mass transit in America. Yeah. I can't tell you that I think the price of a barrel of oil is gonna come down dramatically. I'm happy to see, as you are, that it's come down some recently, but, to somehow think that the price of a barrel of oil is gonna be very inexpensive again, ignores the reality of two major economies--China and India--that are also competing for a finite resource. I mean, it's just a fundamental of economics and so I think that mass transit is gonna be a very, very big factor. A lot of the cities are doing it.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: You understandably see this great optimism about reducing oil costs and energy more generally. But do you recognize the small likelihood that significantly decreasing the price of fuel at the pump and energy for our houses in the midst of enormous increase in demand from emerging economies, like Brazil, China, and India?

JOHN MCCAIN: I do not recognize that. Thank you, though, for your question. In France it takes five years to build a nuclear power plant, five years. And France generates 80% of their electricity using nuclear power, 80%. I know I wasn't planning on taking French but the fact is they can do it, we can too. [...]We can do it through all of the above: wind, tide, nuclear, solar. [...] We have been sailing ships around the world, the United States Navy has, for sixty years, a nuclear power plants on them. Why not in the world can't we do that too? [...]

Subject: RE: CGSGI CEO Executive Search

John:

I had a chance to review your participation by phone in the interviews with the search firm, and they feel that it's difficult to be meaningfully engaged on the phone. Apparently they have done tele-presence before, but they find it creates constraints in engaging with the candidates. What they recommend is arranging an in-person meeting for the second round, and these could be done in DC on Dec. 19-20 if that makes it easier for you. They were also thinking that in between the first and second round, we could entertain flying a group of candidates out to San Francisco to meet Eric. We could also consider flying the candidates to Little Rock to meet with Bruce for that matter.

Let me know if you think I should send a note to Bruce on this, or if you think you would want to discuss it with him. Also, please let me know your thoughts about your seeing the second-round candidates in DC. Thanks.

Terry

Terry,
I need to be in DC on those days, but could probably participate in a number of the interviews by phone from DC. Let's discuss tomorrow.

Subject: Jill Stein's Policy on Israel & Palestine

Tikkun { tē-kün } to heal, repair, and transform the world

Tikkun does not endorse candidates or political parties. But we do seek to inform you of perspectives that have been publlicly articulated. Here is Jill Stein, the Green Party's presidential candidate, articulating her stand on what she would do were she to be president. We have repeatedly tried to get an interview with Bernie Sanders and Hillary Clinton and several Republic Party candidates on these and related issues without any success. So the best we can say is that our readers should compare Jill Stein's statement with others running in all of the political parties, particularly anyone whom you have chosen to support for the nomination to be your party's candidate for president of the U.S.

Dr. Jill Stein on Israel, Palestine and The Middle East

Green Party Presidential Candidate Dr. Jill Stein says U.S. Policy Towards Israel, Palestine and the Middle East Must Change. The American People need no longer fund terror.

Dr. Jill Stein, the Green Party presidential candidate, released a clear and comprehensive policy statement on Israel, Palestine and the Middle East on her website . Jill Stein is the only American Presidential candidate to insist on a Middle-East policy platform grounded in international law, human rights, equality, peace, freedom and justice for everyone. She asks the right questions and provides brilliant answers.

tmf

> “United States policy regarding Israel and Palestine must be revised to make international law, peace and human rights for all people, no matter their religion or nationality, the central priorities. While the U.S. government sometimes voices support for this principle in name, in practice U.S policy towards Palestine and Israel has violated this principle more often than not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In particular, the United States has encouraged the worst tendencies of the Israeli government as it pursues policies of occupation, apartheid, assassination, illegal settlements, blockades, building of nuclear bombs, indefinite detention, collective punishment, and defiance of international law. Instead of allying with the courageous proponents of peace within Israel and Palestine, our government has rewarded consistent abusers of human rights. There is no peace or justice or democracy at the end of such a path. We must reset U.S. policy regarding Israel and Palestine, as part of a broader revision of U.S. policy towards the Middle East.

On taking office, I will put all parties on notice – including the Israeli government, the Palestinian Authority, and the Hamas administration in Gaza – that future U.S. support will depend on respect for human rights and compliance with international law. All three administrations will also be held responsible for preventing attacks by non-state actors on civilians or military personnel of any nationality. The parties will be given 60 days to each demonstrate unilateral material progress towards these ends.

Material progress will be understood to include but not be limited to an end to the discriminatory apartheid policies within the state of Israel, the removal of the Separation Wall, a ban on assassination, movement toward denuclearization, the release of all political prisoners and journalists from Israeli and Palestinian prisons, disarmament of non-state militias, and recognition of the right of self-determination for both Israelis and Palestinians.

Failure by any party to demonstrate sufficient material progress will result in the end of U.S. military and economic aid to that party. Should the end of U.S. aid fail to cause a party to redirect its policies and to take steps resulting in sufficient material progress within an additional 60 days, I will direct my State Department to initiate diplomacy intended to isolate and pressure the offending party, including the use of economic sanctions and targeted boycott. In this way, U.S. policy will begin to become consistent with its practices regarding other violators of human rights and international law in the region.

Consistency in U.S. policy regarding human rights and international law will begin, but not end, with Palestine and Israel. I will apply this same approach to other nations, such as Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, and Yemen, among others. I will also ensure that the United States begins to honor its obligations to protect human rights, and will expect that the world community will hold us to the same account we hold others.

Finally, as President I will put the full weight of the United States behind the establishment of a Palestine and Israel Truth and Reconciliation Commission as the vehicle for shifting from an era of human rights violations to one based on trust and bringing all parties together to seek solutions. Any stakeholder who enters into this process must pledge to work for a solution that respects the rights of all involved. This will bring America's Middle East policy into alignment with American values. I understand that in the end, a dedicated commitment to justice will further American interests in the region much better than the current policies of supporting abuses and violence by one side against the other. And I believe that this is in the best interests of all people living in Israel and Palestine."

Saddam. The decisions back then corresponded to the national will of the countries, and we respect that.

SPIEGEL: What exactly do you expect from the Germans and from German companies?

Maliki: We want to get to know them, and we want to know what they want -- and the things they fear when thinking about Iraq. We have to start over again in many areas, including oil production, the development of the power grid and all industries. There is much to be done.

SPIEGEL: What do you expect from the Germans, politically and militarily? The Bundeswehr (German Armed Forces) occasionally trains Iraqi security forces -- but only in neighboring countries.

Maliki: What matters most to us is that we develop resilient political relationships and work together economically. Our security forces are steadily improving, partly as a result of German efforts. We will be pleased to turn to the Germans to equip our police and military; and should there be new training programs with the German Bundeswehr, we will be happy to accept their help. However, we would clearly prefer that the training take place in Iraq in the future. Overall, I believe that we are gradually becoming self-sufficient.

SPIEGEL: Three weeks ago, your government filed a civil lawsuit in New York against companies that allegedly paid bribes to officials in the Saddam regime. The defendants include three German companies: Daimler, Siemens and B. Braun Melsungen. How is this compatible with your overtures to German industry?

Maliki: We are in negotiations with Siemens for the construction of power plants, which shows just how serious we are. Whether the suit you mention succeeds will be for the courts to decide. Under no circumstances will the consequence be that we no longer wish to work with the companies in question.

SPIEGEL: Large parts of Iraq's assets abroad remain frozen -- and inaccessible to creditors. What will happen to this money when the UN Security Council mandate for Iraq expires at the end of this year?

Maliki: We have hired several international law firms to deal with these assets. At the moment, they are protected by UN resolutions, American law and the personal commitment of President George W. Bush -- and we want this protection to remain in place after the end of UN mandate on Iraq. We consider the claims being lodged against this money to be unjustified. Iraq cannot be punished for crimes that were committed by the dictator. This is very important to us, and a key aspect of our negotiations over the future status of US troops in Iraq.

SPIEGEL: Germany, after World War II, was also liberated from a tyrant by a US-led coalition. That was 63 years ago, and today there are still American military bases and soldiers in Germany. How do you feel about this model?

Maliki: Iraq can learn from Germany's experiences, but the situation is not truly comparable. Back then Germany waged a war that changed the world. Today, we in Iraq want to establish a timeframe for the withdrawal of international troops -- and it should be short. At the same time, we would like to see the establishment of a long-term strategic treaty with the United States, which would govern the basic aspects of our economic and cultural relations. However, I wish to re-emphasize that our security agreement should remain in effect in the short term.

SPIEGEL: How short-term? Are you hoping for a new agreement before the end of the Bush administration?

Maliki: So far the Americans have had trouble agreeing to a concrete timetable for withdrawal, because they feel it would appear tantamount to an admission of defeat. But that isn't the case at all. If we come to an agreement, it is not evidence of a defeat, but of a victory, of a severe blow we have inflicted on al-Qaida and the militias. The American lead negotiators realize this now, and that's why I expect to see an agreement taking shape even before the end of President Bush's term in office. With these negotiations, we will start the whole thing over again, on a clearer, better basis, because the first proposals were unacceptable to us.

SPIEGEL: Immunity for the US troops is apparently the central issue.

Maliki: It is a fundamental problem for us that it should not be possible, in my country, to prosecute offences or crimes committed by US soldiers against our population. But other issues are no less important: How much longer will these soldiers remain in our country? How much authority do they have? Who controls how many, soldiers enter and leave the country and where they do so?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SPIEGEL: Would you hazard a prediction as to when most of the US troops will finally leave Iraq?

Maliki: As soon as possible, as far as we're concerned. US presidential candidate Barack Obama is right when he talks about 16 months. Assuming that positive developments continue, this is about the same time period that corresponds to our wishes.

SPIEGEL: Is this an endorsement for the US presidential election in November? Does Obama, who has no military background, ultimately have a better understanding of Iraq than war hero John McCain?

Maliki: Those who operate on the premise of short time periods in Iraq today are being more realistic. Artificially prolonging the tenure of US troops in Iraq would cause problems. Of course, this is by no means an election endorsement. Who they choose as their president is the Americans' business. But it's the business of Iraqis to say what they want. And that's where the people and the government are in general agreement: The tenure of the coalition troops in Iraq should be limited.

SPIEGEL: In your opinion, which factor has contributed most to bringing calm to the situation in the country?

Maliki: There are many factors, but I see them in the following order. First, there is the political rapprochement we have managed to achieve in central Iraq. This has enabled us, above all, to pull the plug on al-Qaida. Second, there is the progress being made by our security forces. Third, there is the deep sense of abhorrence with which the population has reacted to the atrocities of al-Qaida and the militias. Finally, of course, there is the economic recovery.

SPIEGEL: Critics have accused you of striking harshly against the Mahdi army of Shiite leader Muqtada al-Sadr, while going easy on his rival Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim's Badr militia.

Maliki: That's not true. We proceed just as firmly against anyone who breaks the law. Just a few days ago, we had an incident with a group associated with the Badr people. The army moved in immediately and arrested them all. No one was spared. The punishment is based purely on the nature of the crime, not on the identity of the criminal.

SPIEGEL: In southern Iraq, where you come from, you have been compared with Saddam Hussein when it comes to harshness.

Maliki: That's the sort of thing that people say who don't understand how urgently Iraq needs stability -- or these people prefer instability. We don't want to spread fear and terror in Iraq. We have, for example, given the militias several deadlines to hand over their weapons. Their resistance was tremendous, so we had to oppose them with tremendous force of our own.

SPIEGEL: What role do you envision for your chief rival, Muqtada al-Sadr? Can there ever be national reconciliation in Iraq without his participation?

Maliki: You can only reconcile with someone who wants to reconcile. His Excellency Muqtada al-Sadr can be a political partner, especially if, to that end, he draws on the great spiritual legacy he has inherited from his ancestors. He has understood that his following was eventually infiltrated by criminal elements, by men from the former regime, al-Qaida people and others. The fact that he is now in the process of systematically separating himself from these elements makes him even stronger as a political partner. As a politician, I might add, not as a militia leader.

SPIEGEL: You spent part of your exile in Iran, and you have visited the country several times since you took office. Can you explain to us what the leaders in Tehran are up to? Are they building a nuclear bomb? Do you see this as a serious threat?

Maliki: I have not been made privy to the details of the Iranian nuclear program. Iranian representatives assure us, however, that this program serves peaceful purposes. Even if Tehran wanted to develop a nuclear weapon, it would take a very long time, simply from a technical standpoint. It is obvious that our region is far too fragile for even a single country to possess nuclear weapons, because it will always be an incentive for other countries to also build their own.

SPIEGEL: Exactly 50 years ago, the monarchy in Iraq was overthrown and a republic established. But we didn't see any celebration of this event at all. What does that day mean for the history of Iraq?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Maliki: There may have been people who celebrated. But certainly not all Iraqis. On July 14, 1958, and era came to an end, but what came afterwards didn't live up to our expectations and hopes. What came were decades of military putsches and the dictatorship. We are still dealing with the aftermath today.

SPIEGEL: Mr. Prime Minister, your job is probably one of the most dangerous a politician can have. How do you cope with this, and what do you do to make it bearable?

Maliki: I lead a very simple life -- one that is shaped by external forces, which is apparently what fate has determined for us Iraqis. In that regard, the past few decades of dictatorship have not changed all that much. What keeps me going? The constant exertion of my job -- and the successes we are now having. It means a lot to me to see how much closer we are today to a democratic Iraq, one that respects human rights, than we were only a few months ago.

SPIEGEL: Mr. Prime Minister, thank you for taking the time to speak with us.

Not much to say here. Other than the fact that this is a huge huge huge deal. Article speaks for itself.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes"

And

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

And

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Iraqi PM backs Obama troop exit plan: report
Sat Jul 19, 2008 7:38am EDT

BERLIN (Reuters) - Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki told a German magazine he supported prospective U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's proposal that U.S. troops should leave Iraq within 16 months.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes."

It is the first time he has backed the withdrawal timetable put forward by Obama, who is visiting Afghanistan and us set to go to Iraq as part of a tour of Europe and the Middle East.

Obama has called for a shift away from a "single-minded" focus on Iraq and wants to pull out troops within 16 months, instead adding U.S. soldiers to Afghanistan.

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

Maliki, who is due to visit Germany this week, has suggested a timetable should be set for a U.S. withdrawal but U.S. officials have been more cautious, despite an improving security situation.

The White House said on Friday President George W. Bush and Maliki had agreed that a security deal under negotiation should set a "time horizon" for meeting "aspirational goals" for reducing U.S. forces in Iraq.

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Some five years after the U.S.-led invasion, there are still some 146,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

And

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Is there anything left to say?

Iraqi PM backs Obama troop exit plan: report
Sat Jul 19, 2008 7:38am EDT

BERLIN (Reuters) - Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki told a German magazine he supported prospective U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's proposal that U.S. troops should leave Iraq within 16 months.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes."

It is the first time he has backed the withdrawal timetable put forward by Obama, who is visiting Afghanistan and us set to go to Iraq as part of a tour of Europe and the Middle East.

Obama has called for a shift away from a "single-minded" focus on Iraq and wants to pull out troops within 16 months, instead adding U.S. soldiers to Afghanistan.

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

Maliki, who is due to visit Germany this week, has suggested a timetable should be set for a U.S. withdrawal but U.S. officials have been more cautious, despite an improving security situation.

The White House said on Friday President George W. Bush and Maliki had agreed that a security deal under negotiation should set a "time horizon" for meeting "aspirational goals" for reducing U.S. forces in Iraq.

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Some five years after the U.S.-led invasion, there are still some 146,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq.

Webb said he wouldn't have voted for war in Iraq, wouldn't have authorized the intervention in Libya and will not support Iran having any possibility of getting a nuclear weapon.

He didn't name us, and the first two things are not inaccurate, so I don't think it's worth putting anything out, but just flagging.

This is what i'm sending to holder, napolitano, jones and rice. John, you'll take care of Clinton and Gates, right? Please ask for a copy of their 1 minute remarks by tonight. If you need me to follow up with them, just let me know.

Thanks.

1. NEW BEGINNING

The time has come for a new beginning – a new dawn of American leadership to overcome the challenges of the 21st century, and to seize the opportunities embedded in those challenges. We will strengthen our capacity to defeat our enemies and support our friends. We will renew old alliances and forge new and enduring partnerships. We will show the world once more that America is relentless in defense of our people, steady in advancing our interests, and committed to the ideals that shine as a beacon to the world: democracy and justice; opportunity and unyielding hope.

President-elect Obama believes we need new strategies that balance and integrate all elements of American power diplomacy, military, intelligence, and law enforcement and the power of our moral example. He's picked just the right team to carry that out.

2. CONFIDENT COMMANDER IN CHIEF/READY ON DAY ONE

This is a high-powered national security cabinet who will work together as a TEAM to keep America safe and restore its standing in the world.

These are the choices of a CONFIDENT Commander in Chief who wants strong leadership to advance his agenda and is signaling his intention to work across the aisle in a bipartisan way on the security challenges we face.

President-elect Obama is moving quickly and decisively so will be ready on DAY ONE to meet the challenges that will be there on day one: two wars; terrorism; Iran/North Korea -- spread of nuclear weapons;over-stretched military; energy dependence; conflicts in Sudan, Congo,Guantanamo/detainee issues, etc.

3. BIPARTISANSHIP:

We move forward with respect for America's tradition of a bipartisan national security policy, and a commitment to national unity.

4. AMERICAN POWER RESTORED (specific messages for State, AG, Defense, DHS, UN and NSC -- the order in which they are speaking).

STATE: America is stronger and safer when we pursue vigorous diplomacy. As the President-elect has said, we must engage friends and foes alike.

DOJ: Strong law enforcement and respect for civil liberties can live side by side. We can protect our people, uphold the public trust and adhere to our Constitution.

DOD: We must responsibly end the war in Iraq through a successful transition to Iraqi control, and we must ensure that we have the strategy – and resources – to succeed against al Qaeda and the Taliban. Afghanistan is the central front on the war on terror, and we must refocus our efforts to defeat terror where it started.

DHS:
Protecting our homeland means preventing terrorist attacks and responding to catastrophe – be it manmade or natural. To do that, the federal government must ensure accountability and a high level of cross-government coordination. It must also work hand in hand with state and local governments to share information, secure our borders, and keep our country safe.

UN: The global challenges we face demand global institutions that work. We must work together with the world -- our commitment to multilateral action will be borne out by a commitment to reform. We need the UN to be more effective as a venue for collective action – against terror and proliferation; genocide and conflict; global climate change, poverty and disease.

NSC: To succeed, we must use all elements of American power: our military and diplomacy; our intelligence and law enforcement; our economy and the power of our moral example.

Vice President Elect: Confident Commander in Chief, ready on Day One, high powered cabinet that will form a national security TEAM to keep us safe.

Statement of Frank Giustra

POSTED ON APRIL 23, 2015 BY FRANK GIUSTRA
CATEGORY FRANK GIUSTRA ,

A book that has not yet been published has caused the New York Times to publish a wildly speculative, innuendo-laced article about the Clinton Foundation and my role in contributing money to it. There is not one shred of evidence to back up the Times' conclusions. This is not about me, but rather an attempt to tear down Secretary Clinton and her presidential campaign. If this is what passes for investigative journalism in the United States, it is very sad.

The facts do not comport with the story in the New York Times. The reporter, Jo Becker, wrote a similar piece in 2008, which was eventually debunked by Forbes. http://www.forbes.com/2009/01/12/giustra-clinton-kazakhstan-pf-ii-in_rl_0912croesus_inl.html

1. I began working on financing the purchase of mining stakes from a private Kazakh company in early 2005. The purchase was concluded in late 2005.

- In late 2005, I went to Kazakhstan to finish the negotiations of the sale. Bill Clinton flew to Almaty a few days after I arrived in the country on another person's plane, not on my plane, as the Times reported. Bill Clinton had nothing to do with the purchase of private mining stakes by a Canadian company.
- I sold all of my stakes in the uranium company – Uranium One – in the fall of 2007, after it merged with another company. I would note that those were sold at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the Secretary of State. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the Secretary of State.
- Other media outlets have insinuated that I influenced the decision by the U.S. to sign a free trade agreement with Colombia. At one point, I was an investor in Pacific Rubiales, a Colombian energy company. I sold my shares in Pacific Rubiales several years before the U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, which, I will note, was approved by several U.S. agencies and the White House. To theorize that I had anything to do with that is sheer conjecture.

I hope that the U.S. media can start to focus on the real challenges of the world and U.S. society. Focus on poverty, homelessness, infrastructure, health care, education, or fractious world politics. You are a great country. Don't ruin it by letting those with political agendas take over your newspapers and your airwaves.

I am extremely proud of the work that we have done at the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership. Thousands of people, all over the world, have been helped by this initiative. I plan to continue that work long after the harsh glare of this week's media stories has faded.

Rough Transcript:

CHRIS MATTHEWS: of course, that was florida congresswoman debby wasserman schultz in 2008. not long ago. now hillary clinton is running again and debby is the chair of the democratic committee. a long primary campaign will only erode the benefit democrats are poised to reap from the republicans' free for all. i'm convince that had a prolonged debate will do us more harm than good. is he right? are we better off with bernie noise against hillary or better off without him?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i think eventually the nominee of both parties benefits from having the muscle that they need exercised throughout a primary. i think it atrophies if you don't get to discuss it. i think it is healthy to have a debate throughout the contest. i don't think we'll have a terribly long one.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: hillary clinton will probably win in iowa. new hampshire will be very close. there could be an upset. won't that hurt to the left? further left than she would want to go? won't that weaken her in the general?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: what will happen throughout the primary and the republican party. the contrast will be extremely clear. that any of our candidates, hillary clinton, hillary clinton, bernie sanders, lincoln chafee, any of them, will focus on moving our country forward. continuing job growth that we've had under president obama for more than five straight years. we were at 750 jobs a year.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: so he can beat jeb bush? linoln chafee? come on.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the american people are with democrats.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: do you want to see bernie sanders speak at the democratic convention? do you want him up there?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: bernie sanders –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: do you want him on the floor of the convention?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: bernie sanders has been a good democrat. caucuses with the democrats.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: she speak in prime time? with everybody watching?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: bernie sanders represents, we are a big time –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: so the answer is yes.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: said yes. i can say yes again.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: in prime time.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i don't know what time he should speak.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: maybe when nobody is watching, you mean.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: no. of course he should speak. he should speak in a slot where the appeal that he has across the board, the progressive, pop list message that he has that resonates deeply and widely with the american people, not just democrats, absolutely that should be featured. the difference between us and the republicans, we are really a big party.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: whatever is the difference between a democrat and a socialist? i used to think there is a big difference. what do you think it is?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the difference between –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: a democrat like hillary and a socialist between bernie sanders. what's the big difference between a democrat and a socialist? you're chairman of the democratic party. tell me the difference.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the relevant debate we'll be having what's the difference between a democrat and a republican.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: i think there's a huge difference.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: different between a democrat and republican is that democrats fight to make sure everybody has an opportunity to succeed. and the republicans are strangled by their right wing extremists. so where, we're watching them debate. phasing out medicare. and a candidate who actually said that president obama would march israelis to the ovens. that's the kind of debate going on on their side on. our side, we're talking about the best way that we can make sure every american has a chance to reach the middle class.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: are you in or out of the deal? the nuclear deal?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i'm taking my time to really know that deal well. i'm going to go home and talk to my constituents.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: i'm with you on that. let me ask you a tough question. if you vote it down, it is a -- if the congress votes it down. then you basically voted a vote of no confidence against president's foreign policy. the weird things is those on the right would say now we'll cut a better deal. how can they trust obama cut a better deal if they knock down the only plan?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the problem i see with people opposed to the deal, the republicans, i think, have been very irresponsible. where they're unilaterally immediately –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: they're not looking at it.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i have the. the number one decision, what is the most likely scenario that prevents iran from getting a nuclear women -- nuclear weapon. to make sure we can draw contrast and reemphasize support to make sure everyone has access to health care throughout the entirety of their lives. before medicare, seniors faced medical bankruptcy, families were medically bankrupt. republicans like jeb bush would phase out medicare. every republican on the other side why.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: that's a solid argument. thank you. debby wasserman schultz.

Ms. Murphy, my name is Brent Budowsky, columnist for The Hill newspaper in Washington. For an upcoming column I have a question:

Mr. Peter Schweizer will soon be publishing a book "Clinton Cash" etc. which makes serious allegations against Bill and Hillary Clinton. In her story about this book dated April 19, your reporter Amy Chozick includes the following: "But 'Clinton Cash' is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations including The Times, The Washington Post and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fox News have exclusive agreements with the author to pursue the story lines found in the book."

My question to the New York Times is: exactly what is this exclusive agreement between Mr. Schweizer and the New York Times? Is their any compensation to be offered by the New York Times to Mr. Schweizer or his publisher, or any compensation offered to the New York Times, by Mr. Schweizer or his publisher, in any form? In other words what exactly is the quid pro quo of this arrangement?

The working title of my column will be "Holy War against Hillary Clinton", and one of my topics will be the relationship between the conservative and Republican media infrastructure that organizes these attacks, which is certainly their right, and how the major media reports on these attacks.

This inquiry is purely fact-checking an effort to be accurate and fair in my column. I seek to ascertain the nature and details of the "exclusive relationship" between the NYT and the author and publisher of this book, and I will be candid and tell you I find this relationship strange and troubling. Normally an author publishes a book, and news organizations assign reporters to report on the content of the book without collusion or compensation beyond the normal book promotion and reporter/author relationships.

I may well request a formal interview with Mr. Baquet to discuss this "relationship", but for now I would appreciate in the spirit of fact-checking and fairness the details of this "relationship."

I can be reached via this email and at (202) 296-6177 .

In advance I appreciate your consideration,

Brent Budowsky

From Chuck Todd, Mark Murray, and Andrew Rafferty.

FIRST THOUGHTS.
 The Sound of Silence (Almost) From the '16 Candidates on Drone Deaths: If you've been following American politics over the last six years, President Obama could sneeze, and it would produce a flurry of negative statements and reactions from his political opponents. That's what makes yesterday's silence -- or backtracking -- from Republican 2016 presidential candidates regarding the accidental drone killing of two hostages so striking. As the Wall Street Journal writes , some Republican 2016ers chose not to comment on yesterday's news (Jeb Bush, Scott Walker), while two others who staged a 2013 filibuster against U.S. drone policy had no stomach to protest it (Rand Paul and Ted Cruz). "It is a tragedy that these hostages lost their lives," Paul said in a brief statement, per the Journal . "My prayers and thoughts are with their families." Cruz called for investigation into the deaths, but added: "Make no mistake: responsibility for their deaths lies firmly and unequivocally with the terrorists who kidnapped them and forcibly held them in their command center."

But it's a conversation and debate worth having: Meanwhile, Lindsey Graham -- a hawkish supporter of U.S. intervention overseas -- said, "Collateral damage is part of war. I've got no problem at all with anything that happened, other than my deepest sympathies for those who were held by al Qaeda that became collateral damage." And Marco Rubio added, "We are all safer because of the actions taken every day around the world by our government to go after those who wish Americans harm and to prevent future attacks against us here at home." But what's amazing is that an issue that sparks so much political debate -- Should drones be used in these kinds of operations? What about against American citizens, even those with al Qaeda ties? Should there be more checks and balances? -- the 2016ers essentially punted. These are ALL questions American voters should get answers from the people vying to become the next commander-in-chief. But no one was comfortable having that conversation yesterday. It's a reminder of just how unprepared many of these campaigns are to debate some of the true heavy issues out there.

 The Clinton campaign strikes back: Hours after the New York Times reported on a Canadian mining company -- whose principals donated heavily to the Clinton Foundation over the years -- sold its uranium business to Russia (which had to be approved by Hillary Clinton's State Department), the Clinton campaign struck back at the newspaper. It issued these rebuttals to attempt to knock down any quid-pro-quo:

- 1. Hillary wasn't involved in the State Department's review; it is the assistant secretary of state for economic, energy, and business affairs who makes the call;
- 2. The main Clinton Foundation donor, Frank Giustra, sold his stake in the Canadian mine business in 2007, so before Hillary became secretary of state;
- 3. The State Department was one of nine U.S. agencies to review the sale.

Indeed, upon reflection, that Times article doesn't hold up that well 24 hours after its publication. But if there's a legitimate criticism of the Clintons here -- especially when it comes to the other articles about the Clinton Foundation and Bill's speaking fees (here and here) -- it's that they were sloppy, bordering on being greedy. As Jonathan Chait writes . "All sorts of unproven worst-case-scenario questions float around the web of connections between Bill's private work, Hillary Clinton's public role as secretary of State, the Clintons' quasi-public charity… But the best-case scenario is bad enough: The Clintons have been disorganized and greedy." Just a reminder: Going after the Clintons on personal money and appearances of conflict of interest was a successful message for candidate Barack Obama in 2007-2008.

 Why Ted Cruz skipped the Loretta Lynch vote: He had to catch a flight to a Texas fundraiser: Ted Cruz, who was one of the most vocal critics against Loretta Lynch's nomination for Attorney General, was the only senator to miss her final confirmation vote today because he needed to catch a flight for a previously scheduled commitment in Texas, his campaign told NBC's Kelly O'Donnell and Frank Thorp. "He had to catch a flight for a commitment in Texas," Cruz campaign spokeswoman Catherine Frazier said. According to a fundraising invite obtained by Real Clear Politics , Cruz has a fundraiser in Dallas, TX scheduled for 6:00 pm. Cruz spoke on the Senate floor Thursday morning against Lynch's nomination, and then voted against the procedural vote to move forward with consideration of her nomination, something called "cloture." But Cruz missed the actual vote on Lynch's nomination.

 Conservative writer: "John Kasich should be punished for expanding Obamacare": Here's a reason you might not want to buy stock in John Kasich's POSSIBLE presidential candidacy: He expanded Medicaid in Ohio. And here's the headline from the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein, one of top conservative wonks: "John Kasich should be punished for expanding Obamacare."

 Saturday's two GOP cattle calls: Saturday brings two GOP cattle calls. One is the Iowa Faith & Freedom Coalition spring kick-off, featuring nine 2016ers -- Cruz, Fiorina, Huckabee, Jindal, Paul, Perry, Rubio, Santorum, and Walker. And the other one is the Republican Jewish Coalition confab in Las Vegas, which will also hear from Cruz and Perry, as well as George W. Bush, John Boehner, and Mitt Romney.

 On "Meet" this Sunday: Finally, on "Meet the Press" this Sunday, here's an early look at some of guests: David Boies and Ted Olson (to talk about the Supreme Court's upcoming gay-marriage decision), Arkansas Gov. Asa Hutchinson, and cartoonist Garry Trudeau.

OBAMA AGENDA: Drone Wars
The president said Thursday that the strike against al Qaeda operatives that killed two hostages was "fully consistent" with current guidelines on drone strikes. Those rules will now be under review, the Wall Street Journal reports.

From the New York Times : "By most accounts, hundreds of dangerous militants have, indeed, been killed by drones, including some high-ranking Qaeda figures. But for six years, when the heavy cloak of secrecy has occasionally been breached, the results of some strikes have often turned out to be deeply troubling."

The Washington Post reports , "Current and former U.S. counterterrorism officials said that Thursday's disclosures undercut years of U.S. claims about the accuracy of the drone program."

The Post profiles Warren Weinstein, the U.S. aid worker killed in the drone attack.

Here's Export-Import Bank head Fred Hochberg on why the Export-Import Bank matters.

CONGRESS: Lynch gets confirmed (finally)
"Loretta Lynch was confirmed Thursday as attorney general, the first black woman in American history to hold the country's top law enforcement post," NBC's Halimah Abdullah reports.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell whipped votes to push the nomination through, the Hill reports.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz led the charge against Lynch, but missed the final vote on her confirmation to get back home for a fundraiser, NBC's Kelly O'Donnell and Frank Thorp report.

The contentious Pacific trade deal cleared a major hurdle in the House, the Wall Street Journal reports.

Illinois Democratic Sen. Dick Durbin told CQ Roll Call that he has support to remain whip.

OFF TO THE RACES: Back to Iowa
Nine GOP presidential hopefuls will be in Iowa this weekend for the Faith & Freedom Coalition spring kickoff. The Des Moines Register lays out 10 things to watch ahead of the event.

BUSH: Per CNN : Jeb Bush on Thursday sought to distance himself from former Secretary of State James Baker, one of his foreign policy advisers, saying in a closed-door meeting that he doesn't believe Baker should have recently addressed the liberal-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street.

Iowa Republicans agree Jeb Bush has a Common Core problem, but they differ on how he should deal with it, Politico reports.

And he won't be in Iowa this weekend. Instead, he'll be huddling with donors in Miami, Politico writes.

Despite his indulgence in pie, he is determined to stay slim in 2016, the New York Times reports.

CLINTON: "Hillary Clinton is being called to testify on Benghazi as early as mid-May, according to Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-South Carolina, chair of a committee tasked with investigating the attacks," NBC's Leigh Ann Caldwell and Alex Moe report.

Rep. John Boehner told Bloomberg the House may try to subpoena Clinton's personal email server if she doesn't voluntarily turn it over.

New York Times op/ed : "Hillary Rodham Clinton's determination to reconnect with voters in localized, informative settings is commendable, but is in danger of being overshadowed by questions about the interplay of politics and wealthy foreign donors who support the Clinton Foundation."

Republican National Committee Chair Reince Preibus writes in the Des Moines Register: "Yes, everyday Americans "need a champion." But Clinton is not cut out to be that champion. In her eyes, there's one cause that comes before all else: herself."

KASICH: The National Review asks : Is John Kasich's presidential run for real?

O'MALLEY: In a Washington Post op-ed , the former Maryland governor calls for debt-free college.

RUBIO: The Florida senator jumped to the head of the pack in a new Fox News poll.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Associated Press notes that it was not long ago Rubio was questioning his own readiness to be president.

WALKER: He told a crowd this week that he will not discuss Social Security and Medicare reform until he formally declares a presidential run, the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel reports.

PROGRAMMING NOTES.
 Friday's "News Nation with Tamron Hall" line-up: Frances Rivera is in for Tamron Hall, she will speak with Former Army Ranger & Former CIA counterterrorism analyst Kevin Strouse about the latest on the death of American hostage Warren Weinstein and Italian hostage Giovanni Lo Porto after a drone strike in January, MSNBC's Adam Reiss on the latest protests in Baltimore after the death of Freddie Gray, Native American Actress Allie Young in Adam Sandler's film "Ridiculous 6" after she and other native American actors walked off the set because they said the script insulted native women and elders, and Breaking Bad/Better Call Saul actor Raymond Cruz about his role as Ariel Castro in Life Time's new film: Cleveland Abduction.

We need to bring the same determination and unity to the job of enforcing this agreement and deterring Iranian aggression across the board. When this debate is over, we need to come together to ensure the President has the tools, resources, and support to send a clear message to Iran: Cheat, and you will pay. When you threaten Israel, you threaten America. And make no mistake, we will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement -- never.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Event in South Portland Maine 07/21/08

Hello All,

Unfortunately, flight delays prevented our tracker from getting to today's event. But here's the good news: we captured the video streaming online. Below are the notes from our effort.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- McCain brought a small child onto the stage and said 'we got our newest vet right here'
- McCain said repeatedly that we have 'succeeded in Iraq'
- McCain talked about MoveOn.org and their Petraeus ad from last year, said Obama didn't vote to condemn the ad
- McCain highlighted that he supported the 'surge' when it wasn't popular
- McCain repeats 'We've got to have the same strategy in Afghanistan as we've had in Iraq.'
- McCain told a previously untold story about being a POW; the story is a significant part of the overall speech

South Portland, Maine: McCain Event 07/21/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details:

- a small "COUNTRY FIRST" McCain campaign sign at a podium
- Audience appeared to be mostly vets (Event took place at the Maine Military Museum)
- About 15-20 protesters outside the event, incl. Planned Parenthood ("Birth control not bans" and "Reproductive justice for all" signs), AFL-CIO antiwar protesters ("It's time to turn around America"), "McCain free trade hurts me", "Don't vote for McSame" etc
- Susan Collins and Olympia Snow on stage with McCain

Speech Highlights:

- thanks Susan Collins
- thanks vets, invites little child on stage, "Matthew." McCain says "we've got our newest vet right here"

- i'd like to ask for your sympathy for the state of AZ - it may be the only state in USA where mothers don't tell their kids they'll grow up to be Prez
- 2 issues: energy and security
- Our dependence on foreign oil isn't just an economic issue--hits lowest income Americans the hardest--it's also a . I will end this dependence on foreign oil "I will depend it. [corrects] I will end it."
- It's safe. We've never had an accident on Navy ships. Obama doesn't want to re-process nuclear and he doesn't want to [stumbles] store nuclear waste.
- Nuclear power plants will employ 700K people.
- We can end this dependence and we must: batteries that can take cars 200mi, clean coal technology. USA has always responded when we have a challenge.
- Let me talk to you about the wars we are in. No one hates wars more than the vets b/c he feels most keenly the loss of a comrade. We are in a "titanic" struggle against radical Islamic extremism and we're going to be in this struggle for a long time.
- Iraq is central battleground in war on terror. And we are succeeding in Iraq--we have succeeded in Iraq.
- Petraeus is a great general. ICYMI, MoveOn last year took out "Gen Petraeus or Betray-us " ad and we had a resolution to condemn it and Obama wouldn't vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- We have succeeded in Iraq but I will bring our troops home with honor.
- I said I'd rather lose a campaign than lose a war. And I'm proud of what we've done.
- Obama opposed the surge and he was wrong and he refuses to acknowledge even now that the surge is succeeding. That's what judgment is about. That's why I'm qualified to lead and I don't need on-the-job training.
- "We've got to have the same strategy in Afghanistan as we've had in Iraq." Yes we need more troops. We need to get our NATO allies.
- I know some Americans are divided in this-- I can hear some citizens now [referring to protesters]. But I'm proud we haven't disrespected our military - Long ago and far away I served time in a Vietnamese prison camp and I saw many acts of courage and honor. I have a story I want to tell. They kept is in solitary confinement to break us. But we kept in communication. Later they changed it and put us in a cell of 25 people.
- Mike Christian shared a cell with me. He came from a poor family. Uniform was like pajamas, I recommend the sandals--one pair lasted me 5 1/2 years. As part of the change in treatment, the North Vietnamese let us receive packages from home. Mike Christian fashioned an American flag and sowed it to the inside of his uniform. Every night we would say the pledge of allegiance to that. The Pledge is not always the most important, but there it was great. The North Vietnamese found out about it and they took him out and beat him very badly. McCain woke up and found Mike Christian sewing another flag. He wasn't doing that because it made him feel better; he knew how important it was to the rest of us. So whenever I'm in the company of heroes like I am today, it inspires me to lead. Because I know I can inspire a generation of Americans to serve a cause greater than themself. I will always put my country first.
- Shakes hands and walks out.

Dear Jake,

Please see my edits below. Of course, we must see the final agreement. But I am very concerned that a complete embrace of this deal, without any expression of reservations, will leave her open to serious attack not just from Republicans, but from many Democrats, and from many of the key signatories of the Washington Institute letter, including Howard Berman, Dennis Ross, and people whose opinions on nuclear issues one needs to respect, like Robert Einhorn, and other non-proliferation experts like David Albright. She can certainly make clear her opposition to Congress overturning the deal, which would weaken the President greatly.

Best wishes,

I took some of your concepts but left out the specifics.

The deal between six world powers and Iran offers the best path forward to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, despite its deficiencies. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, and the region safer and more secure. I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for this important accomplishment.

[I would have preferred an agreement that provided access to all of Iran's nuclear sites, including its military facilities; that allowed the IAEA inspectors the opportunity to interview all people they believe necessary to establish Iran's past and ongoing Possible Military Dimensions; and that sequenced sanctions relief to documented performance of Iran's obligations. However, this agreement is better than no deal at all, which would leave Iran the unfettered opportunity to a full-scale march to a nuclear weapon, without any of the constraints of this agreement in place.]

As President, I would use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. Neither Iran nor any other country would have a veto over our enforcement. And I would never permit Iran to interpret this deal to allow it to evade its obligations to the IAEA or to place any suspicious site off limits to inspectors. The response to any violation must be immediate and overwhelming -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force.

The message to Iran should be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy of pressure and engagement executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy and forced its representatives to the table – starting in Oman in 2012 -- to negotiate a deal that can put a nuclear weapon out of reach.

Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that cuts off its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. It is developing missiles that can strike every country in the Middle East. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held in Iranian prisons, and strengthen security cooperation with our allies and partners. Sanctions for terrorism, and other non-nuclear sanctions, should remain in place.

Israel has to be confident that the United States will always defend its security and ensure its Qualitative Military Edge in the region. I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our alliance. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

I support this deal because it blocks Iran's pathways to a nuclear weapon and gives us tools to catch Iran if it tries to cheat. Ultimately, the alternatives were worse for America. Imposing new, unilateral sanctions, or engaging in military force at this juncture, would risk fracturing the world consensus we have painstakingly built, undermining our maximum leverage at a time when Iran is at its most vulnerable.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of strong American leadership.

THE STORY

Yesterday, the GOP had an existential crisis.

WHAT HAPPENED?

Last month, House Speaker John Boehner (R-OH) announced he was calling it quits , and everyone thought Rep. Kevin McCarthy (R-CA) would take his place. Until yesterday, when McCarthy said 'not running anymore.' Cue the GOP freaking out.

WHY'D HE DROP OUT?

McCarthy said he couldn't win over the far-right members of the party, and he thinks the position needs a fresh face. Boehner said 'you can't tell, but all the color has drained from my face,' and postponed the vote to elect a new speaker. And then reportedly started trying to recruit other options (cough, Paul Ryan , cough). Everyone else said 'maybe this has something to do with McCarthy's facepalm moment last week,' when he hinted that the Benghazi committee (to investigate the 2012 attack there) was created in part just to damage Hillary Clinton's campaign. To which many in the GOP said 'well, this is awkward.'

Officials said the stabbing isn't terror-related, and has nothing to do with his hero moment in France. Stone's in serious but stable condition.

Oops. Yesterday, the US military leaked word that four Russian cruise missiles aimed at Syria mistakenly landed in Iran . Hate when that happens. It's unclear where in Iran the missiles ended up, or what kind of damage they caused. The US says Russia has never used these kinds of missiles in combat, which might explain why things didn't go quite as planned. Reminder: Russia and Iran have teamed up to help Syrian President Assad in the country's civil war. Yesterday, Russia deny, deny, denied the alleged misfire, and Iran brushed off the report as part of the US's "psychological warfare" tactics. In case you missed it, Syria is also where the US is leading a meh coalition to defeat ISIS. Subject: August Vacation and the Freedom to Travel

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here

August 15, 2014

Dear Friends:

Just so you know, we are clearing out of the office for a week, which means we won't be sending a fresh edition of the Cuba Central News Blast until August 29th. We're going on vacation!

Of course, if we were working in Europe we'd have longer leave (and a better Cuba policy). But, we still consider ourselves lucky, and still count ourselves as baffled that U.S. law frustrates the ability of most Americans to visit Cuba.

These restrictions on what Americans can do are imposed on us by the U.S. government in the name of advancing freedom in Cuba. Which itself is altogether odd, when you consider that it is more restrictive, more bureaucratic, and more costly for nearly all Americans to receive permission from our government to visit Cuba than it is for Cubans to visit the United States or any other country.

Even worse, some policymakers in Congress would like to increase the restrictions on Americans who want to visit Cuba at a moment when more Cubans are coming to the U.S. and traveling the world than at any time since 1959.

Even worse than that, these same policy makers -- the ones who restrict our rights to travel as a method for bringing democracy to Cuba -- are also the biggest fans of our totally messed up "regime change" programs run out of USAID. Read Fulton Armstrong's recent piece about them here . They want to shut the front door to Cuba while sending in a cast of amateurs and subversives through the backdoor. To do what? To break Cuba's information blockade? Isn't that what travel's for?

George Orwell could've designed the policy. Some Americans -- Cuban Americans, academics, and journalists -- are more equal than others. If you cannot be stuffed into one of these categories, you can journey to the island on a people-to-people program. But it can be costly and the U.S. stipulates what you can do or can't do once you arrive.

For most of Cuba's post-revolutionary history, the government put tight restrictions on the right of their people to travel anywhere. The U.S. State Department is still handing out copies of a speech that President George W. Bush delivered in 2007, in which he said: "In Cuba it is illegal to change jobs, to change houses, to travel abroad..."

But, in January 2013, Cuba eliminated the requirement that its travelers obtain exit visas. As Human Rights Watch reported this year, "Nearly 183,000 people traveled abroad from January to September 2013, according to the government. These included human rights defenders, journalists, and bloggers who previously had been denied permission to leave the island despite repeated requests, such as blogger Yoani Sanchez."

The end of travel restrictions has begun a blossoming of economic and social openings for

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cubans. Cuentapropistas (self-employed Cubans, since it is now legal to change jobs) have reaped incredible material and professional gains from being able to purchase much needed inputs -- at better prices and higher quality -- and to meet their counterparts in the U.S., who share knowledge, experience and insight with them.

Our friend, Niuris Higuera, owner of Atelier Paladar in Havana, said she went home with "her head spinning from all the projects she wanted to develop in Cuba," based on ideas she picked up in the States.

The experience was even more profound for young participants in a summer exchange program arranged by the Center for Democracy in the Americas and Cuba Educational Travel (CET) to bring four young Cubans to the U.S. to do homestays and internships.

As Collin Laverty of CET wrote us, Yoan Duarte, who graduated from the University of Havana in June and hopes to become a fashion designer, spent the summer in New York City shadowing some of the industry's best. "The first few weeks I was constantly slapping myself in the face, thinking I was going to wake up in Havana at any moment. Now I'm eager to get back and put to work all the new skills I've acquired," he said recently. Yoan plans to start his own clothing line upon return to Cuba.

Earlier today, the White House posted this paean to the travel industry, praising the growing number of jobs it is creating, the upward spiral of spending on travel and tourism-related goods and services, and how the U.S. hopes to welcome 100 million visitors per year by 2021.

We can only imagine what a stir would be created if Cubans and Americans of non-Cuban descent enjoyed the unrestricted right to exchange ideas and experience without any restrictions. It would be good. It would be human. But, today, that is not reality.

But the President can change that. He has executive authority to broaden revenue-producing, information-exchanging, re-humanizing, and demystifying travel between the island and our country, which has outsized benefits compared to secreting USAID contractors into Cuba masquerading as advocates working on AIDS prevention, when they're really trying to incite rebellion.

The choice ought to be clear to the President who, after all, got to go on vacation a week before us (which is, like, totally fair, ok?).

Happy vacation.

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Cuban women entrepreneurs visit Miami

Five Cuban women, who work on the island as cuentapropistas, or self-employed workers, visited Miami last week to share their experiences starting and running businesses in Cuba, the Miami Herald reports. Their ten-day trip to the U.S. was organized by the Cuba Study Group.

The delegation included Yamina Vicente, a former economics professor at the University of Havana who started a decorating and party planning business with her sister, and Niuris Higueras, who runs Atelier, one of the most popular restaurants in Havana's Vedado neighborhood. Vicente and Higueras came to the U.S. last November with the Center for Democracy in the Americas, where they met with officials in Congress and the White House, and were featured at CDA's conference, "Cubans in the New Economy: Their Reflections and the U.S. Response," at The George Washington University. See brief video of their appearance here .

In Miami, the cuentapropistas said they have been successful so far, making good profits and experiencing little difficulty in obtaining business licenses, a process that some Cubans report as an obstacle. The panelists said that the principal challenges they face include the sparse availability of capital and difficulty securing leasing contracts.

Increase in number of Cuban immigrants crossing the Mexican border into U.S.

Of the nearly 21,000 Cubans that have entered the U.S. through immigration control points this fiscal year, almost 14,000 arrived by crossing the Mexico-U.S. border, an increase of 150% since 2009, reports Café Fuerte . The majority of these Cubans request asylum upon reaching U.S. Border Control, invoking the 1966 Cuban Adjustment Act, which grants permanent residency to Cubans that reach the U.S. and stay for a year.

Emigration from Cuba has risen since President Raúl Castro's 2013 migratory reforms , which dropped the requirement that Cubans obtain an exit visa in order to leave the island. The increase in Cuban immigration through the Mexican border coincides with a rise in the number of Cubans intercepted in the Strait of Florida. Over 1,500 have been stopped so far this year -- the most since 2008.

Cubans with Spanish nationality have also been arriving in record numbers, reports Café Fuerte. A 2008 law passed in Spain allows people who have a Spanish grandparent to become naturalized Spanish citizens. Cubans that obtain a Spanish passport using the 2008 law can travel to the U.S. without visa requirements, as is the case with all European Union countries.

Cuba policy re-emerges as issue in Florida gubernatorial race

The campaign to re-elect Florida Republican Governor Rick Scott released a video on Wednesday that shows Charlie Crist, Democratic gubernatorial candidate, and Annette Taddeo, Crist's running mate, taking contrasting positions on the U.S. embargo against Cuba. Following the video's release, Cuba policy has resurfaced as a hot-button issue in an already heated race, reports the Nuevo Herald .

Crist supports lifting the embargo to benefit Florida businesses, but on Monday Taddeo told reporters she "[doesn't] think we should be doing business with Cuba." Earlier this year, Crist announced his intention to visit Cuba only to cancel his travel plans weeks later. Crist says he still wants to see the island, but will wait until after the November election.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

27th round of peace talks between Colombia and the FARC begins in Havana

Peace talks between Colombia's government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), the group that has waged a guerrilla war in Colombia since its formation in the 1960s, resumed on Tuesday in Havana, EFE reports. This session of talks, the 27th in a series that started in November 2012, focuses on "recognition and reparation" for the conflict's victims -- the fourth objective in a five-part peace plan . The negotiations have already addressed land and rural development, political participation, and illegal drugs. The fifth stage of the plan aims to end the conflict altogether.

EFE reports that FARC leader Rodrigo Londoño said that the current round will be particularly complex:

> "It will have to be explained to [the victims] what happened, why they were treated in this way, and then those responsible for that will have to be brought to light. The victims will have to have the satisfaction of having explained to them what happened, whatever the causes, and that needs to be clear not only for them but for all Colombians."

Because of the delicate nature of this round of negotiations, Londoño said that a peace deal will not be finalized this year. EFE reports that five delegations of victims will participate directly in this round of talks; the first delegation will arrive August 16. During the 50 years of conflict, 220,000 victims died, 25 thousand were disappeared, 5.7 million were displaced, and 27 thousand were kidnapped, according to Colombia's Center for Historical Memory.

EU and Cuba to resume talks August 27 in Brussels

The second round of negotiations to establish the Political Dialogue and Cooperation Agreement between Cuba and the European Union (EU) will take place in Brussels on August 27 and 28, according to an "EU source," reports EFE. In the first round of talks, which took place in Havana in April, the parties agreed to a format for negotiations and an outline of the future agreement.

Since December 1996, the EU's relations with Cuba have been governed by the Common Position, which, like the U.S. Helms-Burton Act of the same year, stipulates that economic and diplomatic cooperation with Cuba will depend upon "improvements in human rights and political freedom" and an "irreversible opening of the Cuban economy." EFE reports that the EU will continue to maintain its Common Position during its negotiations with Cuba. All 28 EU member states must reach a unanimous agreement to repeal the measure. Even so, the EU has sought to deepen its ties with Havana while encouraging the reforms the island has already undertaken.

Americas Quarterly recently published an article by Sarah Stephens, CDA's executive director, arguing that the EU's willingness to engage with Cuba should serve as a model for U.S. policy. Read it here.

WTO director visits Cuba, applauds foreign investment efforts

Roberto Azevedo, director of the World Trade Organization (WTO), visited Cuba this week during a tour of Latin America that also included Mexico and El Salvador, reports EFE. In Cuba, Azevedo met with Vice President Ricardo Cabrisas, Rodrigo Malmiercas, Minister of Foreign Commerce and Foreign Investment, and Abelardo Moreno, Deputy Minister of Foreign Relations. He also met with officials in charge of the Special Economic Development Zone at Mariel Port.

OnCuba reports that Azevedo was encouraged by Cuba's Foreign Investment Law, which went into effect in June, as well as the Special Zone at Mariel. He said to Cuban media, "There is a need to attract foreign investors, and it looks like Cuba is now in that process of finding its recipe."

Azevedo also advocated for "overcoming political and geopolitical tensions that lead to restrictive measures," referring to the U.S. embargo. Azevedo continued, "To the extent that it is possible to move forward with dialogue, to move in the direction of normalization of relations, is always the preferable path."

Cuba celebrates Fidel Castro's 88th birthday

Cuba celebrated the 88th birthday of former President Fidel Castro with a photo exhibit and the restoration of his birth home in Birán, reports the Associated Press. The photo exhibit "Fidel is Fidel" opened Tuesday at Havana's Jose Martí Memorial and features images of Castro taken between 2005 and 2012 by photographer Roberto Chile, who photographed Castro over a 25 year period.

In Birán, construction workers and specialists from the Havana Historian's Office restored Castro's birth home, a school he attended, and other homes, hotels and public facilities. Castro's rural estate home in Birán, which serves as a museum, is a replica of the original family home that burned down years ago, reports the Latin American Herald Tribune.

Cuban court sentences three baseball players in human trafficking operation allegedly run by MLB star Yasiel Puig

A provincial court in Cienfuegos imposed five-year prison sentences on three Cuban athletes for planning to smuggle baseball players out of the country as part of a trafficking operation. The scheme was allegedly run by Yasiel Puig of the Los Angeles Dodgers and Miami resident Raúl Pacheco Hernández, reports Café Fuerte .

The convicted were Eduardo Antonio Soriano Díaz, Dumay Pedroso, and Ramón Eusebio Navarro. The case began when Noelvis Etenza, a pitcher for Cienfuegos and member of Cuba's national team, reported to Cuban State Security that Puig had offered to pay for him to leave the country by speedboat in order to play baseball in the U.S. Etenza claimed that the three Cuban players involved in the operation had approached him on multiple occasions to encourage him to accept Puig's offer.

Although the smuggling of baseball players out of the country is treated as a serious crime in Cuba, top talent is enticed by the possibility of multi-million dollar contracts in the U.S. Major Leagues. Puig himself defected to the U.S. in 2012, securing a $42 million contract, and first baseman José Dariel Abreu left Cuba to sign on to a $68 million contract with the Chicago White Sox in 2013. Because of the continued drain of high-level Cuban athletes, government officials in Cuba have placed pressure on players, encouraging them to deliver information on trafficking activities.

For more on Yasiel Puig's alleged involvement with smuggling, see this piece that ESPN Magazine ran in June.

Catholic Cubans plan to build first new church since the Revolution

A group of Cuban Catholics are awaiting official permission to begin construction of the first Catholic Church to be built in Cuba since the 1959 revolution, reports BBC News . The church will be built in Santiago de Cuba, where it will replace another church that was destroyed in 2012 by Hurricane Sandy, which left Santiago's Catholics with few places to worship after destroying seven churches and damaging twenty-eight.

The group still needs to raise $250 thousand to finance the project, but Fox News Latino reports that parishes abroad plan to contribute most of the funds. The St. Lawrence parish in Tampa, Florida, which is primarily composed of Cuban exile families, has already pledged funds to support the project.

Fausto Veloz, the project's engineer, hopes to build the new church using the twenty-five tons of scrap metal that were left over from the stage constructed for Pope Benedict XVI's 2012 visit, which took place just months before Hurricane Sandy. For Veloz, "reusing the metal means keeping alive the memory of something good for us Catholics. It gives it new life, so it can serve future generations."

Although Cuba has been a secular state since 1992, laws from an era in which Cuba was officially atheist remain on the books, posing a challenge to those who wish to build new churches.

Cuba to shift focus to renewable energy and onshore oil wells

Cuba's government plans to re-focus its energy exploration efforts on improving the efficiency of existing onshore wells while also developing renewable alternatives, reports Reuters . Cuba's recent push for offshore oil exploration produced grim results -- the three wells drilled in 2012 by several foreign firms came up dry, and the Spanish, Indian, Malaysian, and Russian companies that were previously interested in drilling in Cuban waters have abandoned the endeavor.

Cuban officials had hoped that the discovery of deep-water oil fields would reduce their dependence on Venezuelan oil imports, but the combination of readily available oil fields in other parts of the world and tough U.S. sanctions, which require that Cuban oil rigs contain no more than 10% U.S. technology, also discouraged potential foreign investors.

Despite the failures offshore, Russia , China, and Canada have agreed to help Cuba improve its existing oil extraction efforts onshore, and Cuba will seek investors in renewable energy opportunities like biomass and wind. Over the next 15 years, Cuba plans to invest $3.6 billion in alternative energy, with the goal of reducing the percentage of reducing oil's share of energy generation from 96% to 76%.

At the same time, leading environmental organizations like the Environmental Defense Fund continue to press for changes in U.S. policy to protect the ecosystems that Cuba and the U.S. share. Listen here to a recent radio report about their work.

Retired professors to be re-hired, paid extra

Retired professors in Cuba will be able to return to their jobs and receive their pre-retirement salary as well as their retirement pension, according to a new policy printed in the Gaceta Oficial, reports Cuban state newspaper Granma . This measure is an attempt to improve the quality of higher education, better prepare graduates, and mitigate the shortage of professors in several subject areas, including "agriculture, accounting, economics, natural sciences, and engineering," said Ana Karell Rodríguez, Director of Human Resources at the Ministry of Higher Education.

She also described the process for re-hiring the retirees:

> "It is not an automatic process, as not all those that are retired will be re-hired without a previous analysis. That will depend on the needs of each university, the results accumulated by the professor during his career, and how up-to-date that person is on the materials to be imparted."

According to Granma, 35 thousand professors and researchers are employed in the 67 institutions of higher education across the country, 9 thousand of which are "teachers and teachers' assistants" and 4 thousand of which have doctorates in science. Sixty percent of professors are sixty years old or older, and the average age is fifty.

Internet users and computer access increase in Cuba

Users of Cuba's national internet network have increased by more than 50 thousand over the past year, and computer access has increased 61% since 2008, reports Café Fuerte . Cuba's National Statistics Office also reported that the number of personal computers on the island increased from 74 thousand to 90 thousand between 2012 and 2013. While only 515,400 computers on the island are networked, the number of Internet users rose to 2,923,000. Only 15% of Cubans are connected to the Internet because of high prices and access restrictions on applications and services other than email. The state-run Telecommunications Company of Cuba has announced plans to extend Internet access to homes, but has not specified when the plans will be implemented.

Subject: Re: Iran riff

I like this. I was just working on something as well that's a bit more expansive and takes a more direct hit at those who are outside the bounds of debate (which despite my earlier reluctance I'm now more in to having written it). Substance draws both on her statement from the organizing event earlier this week and from her original statement. Feel free to use any of this if helpful.

I support the President's agreement with Iran because it can help us prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this agreement can make the United States, Israel, and our Arab partners safer.

But let's take a step back and reflect on how we got here. President Obama and I inherited this problem when we took office. When George W. Bush was president, the Iranians mastered the nuclear fuel cycle. They also built covert facilities and stocked them with centrifuges, and they were spinning away, trying to get enough highly enriched uranium to be able – if they so chose – to move toward a weapon. That's what we inherited.

As a Senator, I had voted for every sanction that we could possibly imagine against Iran because I viewed them as a very dangerous adversary. But U.S. sanctions alone were not stopping them, because the rest of the world did not share our concern. So when I became I went to work immediately to persuade China and Russia and other powers to join with us with international sanctions, passed by the UN. I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history. Then I worked to implement them, traveling around the world, making the case to countries -- like India, like South Korea -- that they had to cut off their purchases of oil and gas from Iran. So we were beginning to see these biting sanctions on the Iranian economy, and then they came to the negotiating table. This sequencing is important to remember, because you play the hand you are dealt. And we played that hand to get them to the table to make unprecedented concessions about what they would or would not do.

Now this deal is not perfect. Making this deal work will require vigorous enforcement. And as President, I would do just that – I know how to build the coalition against them because I did it once. I know from experience what it took to build a global effort to get this done; I know what it will take to rally our partners to enforce it. I will do everything necessary to make sure the lid stays on their nuclear weapons program. As President, I would use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. At the outset, we must see the verified roll back of the Iranian nuclear program required by the agreement. We can never permit Iran to evade its obligations or to place any suspicious site off limits to inspectors. And the response to any cheating must be immediate and decisive – starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, our military options. The message to Iran should be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

And I will form a coalition to counter all of Iran's other dangerous activities: destabilizing governments, exporting and funding terrorism, threatening Israel. But as president, I'd rather be dealing with those challenges, knowing that we have slowed down and put a lid on their nuclear weapons program. We have to broadly confront and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held in Iranian prisons, and strengthen security cooperation with our allies and partners. Sanctions for terrorism, and other non-nuclear sanctions, must remain a key part of our strategy and must be vigorously enforced. And Israel has to be confident that the United States will always ensure its Qualitative Military Edge in the region and its capacity to defend itself by itself. We must also deepen our security relationship with our Arab partners threatened by Iran. This includes our continued presence and providing needed capabilities. Iran should have no doubt about our support for the security of our partners.

Now I know a lot of people are debating the merits of this deal. And there are good reasons to do so – because it is consequential for our security and the security of our allies. And as I said it is not perfect. But while I respect those who are carefully considering the merits of the deal, I have a real problem with those who are seeking to politicize something as serious as our national security, and the security of Israel. So while the Republicans insisted on having 60 days to review this deal, the truth is that nearly all of them declared their opposition to the deal within minutes of its conclusion. Saying that our President is funding terrorism; that he does not represent the American people in his dealings with other governments; writing to leaders of other countries to undermine our negotiators – these are out of bounds. Actions like that are not leadership – they make our country weaker. They allow our enemies to think we have cleavages that they can use against us. That they can manipulate our political against us. I'll debate anyone on the merits of this agreement – and debate is something we as Americans do very well. But I've always believed that politics stops at the water's edge. That we are stronger as a nation when we are united.

And if the agreement is not approved, all bets are off. The coalition we worked so hard to build to impose sanctions and negotiate with Iran would collapse; Iran would get the benefits it seeks without restrictions on its nuclear program. And we'd be back to where we started, with Iran only 2-3 months away from a bombs worth of plutonium.

So that's why I strongly believe that the United States and our allies are better off with this deal – along with vigorous enforcement and with a comprehensive strategy to counter Iran's other bad behaviors – than without it. And why I believe we need a proven leader who knows how to exercise real strength to do so.

We need to bring the same determination and unity to the job of enforcing this agreement and deterring Iranian aggression across the board. When this debate is over, we need to come together to ensure the President has the tools, resources, and support to send a clear message to Iran: Cheat, and you will pay. When you threaten Israel, you threaten America. And make no mistake, we will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement -- never.

Subject:	how we just changed an entire Governor's race in 48 hours--without any fingerprints

Dear Investors & Key Advisors,

Wanted to send you a quick update...

As you may have heard with the hard work of the folks at ProgressNow Colorado as part of Colorado's "communication hub" they dug up weeks ago and carefully passed on information to the mainstream media on how the leading GOP candidate for Governor, former Congressman Scott McInnis plagiarized a report he provided on water policy for a foundation in Colorado.

In the past 48 hours, McInnis and the entire Republican party of Colorado are in free-fall. There are now calls even within the Republican party for McInnis to withdraw.

The best part is that ProgressNow Colorado nor any of our allies had their fingerprints on any of the excellent behind-the-scenes work to develop and then break this story. This has led to three straight days of front page Denver Post coverage as well as the editorial below and statewide media, a share of which is linked to below.

If you want to discuss how PN can be of further help to you in other states, please let me know a good time and number to reach you.

EDITORIAL
McInnis should throw in the towel

After revelations of plagiarism and other cases of questionable judgment, it's clear the GOP candidate is not fit to be governor.

By The Denver Post
POSTED: 07/14/2010 01:00:00 AM MDT

Revelations of extensive plagiarism in work that gubernatorial candidate Scott McInnis claimed as his own call into question his fitness for public office.

The lifted work, examined in The Denver Post, constitutes inexcusable intellectual thievery. It is so damaging that we believe McInnis ought to drop out of the race.

Colorado's next governor should be a person of integrity, a trusted hand to lead the state through difficult times.

The Post revealed in Tuesday's paper that McInnis was paid to write essays on water in 2005 and 2006 yet turned in writings that had been plagiarized. Now we learn he did the same thing in a 1994 op-ed in the Rocky Mountain News.

We were astonished Tuesday to hear McInnis, in an interview with 9News, call the revelations over his water essays a "non-issue." Later, he did tell us he had made a mistake and that he should have checked the material. Yes, he should have.

The Hasan Family Foundation paid McInnis $300,000 over two years to give talks on water issues and write original, monthly articles on the topic. The plagiarism detailed by Post reporter Karen E. Crummy is extensive.

McInnis says he hired a consultant to serve as an expert for the writings. Yet the foundation hired McInnis as the expert, and McInnis' work never mentioned the help of anyone else. It was presented as his own.

The written work he submitted to the foundation included numerous instances of passages that were copied, with few changes, from scholarly work originated by Gregory J. Hobbs, who is now a Colorado Supreme Court justice.

The former congressman was paid handsomely for work that he said was "original and not reprinted from any other source." It was McInnis' obligation to ensure that was true.

Unfortunately, this is not the first time we've had questions about McInnis' judgment.

During his final term in Congress, he paid his wife $37,000 to be his campaign manager — even though he already had decided he wasn't going to run for re-election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As we said in 2004, the arrangement "smacks of bad judgment."

More recently, we were taken aback by McInnis' refusal to release tax forms, even though Colorado's gubernatorial candidates since 1998 routinely have done so.

What is he hiding?

McInnis' financial records are pertinent information. Detractors have characterized him as a "lawyer-lobbyist," and we think voters have a right to know how he has made his money.

We've also been puzzled by McInnis' inability — or refusal, it's difficult to know which — to provide detail on his philanthropy even though he claims to have been generous to individuals down on their luck.

The best specific example he could come up with was having given the meat of a dead elk to a family in need. Equally odd was his failure to recall being a member of an advisory board for a pro-choice GOP group.

The plagiarism and other issues have cumulatively so damaged McInnis' credibility that we do not believe he can be an effective governor. Even though McInnis acknowledged he made a mistake, he still spent part of Tuesday blaming a research assistant for the failure to credit the work.

If you put your name on something and take money for it — a lot of money in this case — it is your responsibility to make rock-solid sure it is bona fide, original work that will stand up to scrutiny.

The state's chief executive must be someone Coloradans can believe in as the state suffers a stretch of tight budgets and a struggling economy.

If Scott McInnis cannot be trusted to turn in what amounts to an overpaid term paper — without plagiarizing someone else's work — there is no way he can be relied upon to guide Colorado through these complicated times.

Storm over possible plagiarism in McInnis writings escalates

A new example of possible plagiarism by Scott McInnis surfaced Tuesday as the Republican gubernatorial candidate faced calls to repay $300,000 he received for plagiarized essays on water that he submitted as "original works."

A Denver Post review of McInnis' floor speeches and columns published during his congressional career found striking similarities between a 1995 speech and 1994 column by McInnis and a previously published Op-Ed in The Washington Post.

"There is a growing popular belief in South Korea that the North has outmaneuvered Washington and marginalized the South's role," wrote Richard V. Allen and Daryl M. Plunk in a Washington Post Op-Ed published Nov. 9, 1994.

Six weeks later, McInnis wrote in the Rocky Mountain News: "There is growing South Korean sentiment that North Korea has outmaneuvered Washington and marginalized the South's input into this issue."

A month after that, he made the same statement on the House floor with only minor alteration.

McInnis has declined interview requests from The Denver Post since the paper first reported that the "Musings on Water" articles he submitted to the Hasan Family Foundation as "original works" included passages that were similar to or copied directly from a 1984 essay by now-Colorado Supreme Court Justice Gregory Hobbs.

Sean Duffy, spokesman for the McInnis campaign, declined to comment on the new findings Tuesday afternoon, saying that the two hours he had to look into The Post's comparison was not enough time to discover how the similarities may have occurred.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We got faulty research"

McInnis on Tuesday declared the plagiarism of the water essays a "non-issue" that Colorado voters don't care about.

Although his campaign manager put out a statement late Monday saying McInnis believes the "buck stops" with him, McInnis spent Tuesday asserting that he failed only in that he did not monitor his research assistant closely enough.

"We got faulty research," McInnis told 9News. "This is a nonissue if it's not a political year. Voters don't really care about this issue. They care about jobs, getting back to work."

McInnis also told 9News he expected there were numerous other problems with the water essays he submitted as his own work.

Rolly Fischer, a former engineer who McInnis said was responsible for lifting paragraphs and at least four full pages from work written by Colorado Supreme Court Justice Gregory Hobbs, denied the charge.

"Scott's responsible for it," he said to the Glenwood Springs Post-Independent, and then declined to comment further.

Contacted by a Denver Post reporter at his home Tuesday, Fischer declined to comment, saying, "I don't trust the press."

In a statement released late Monday, Hasan Family Foundation board chair Seeme Hasan, a Republican, said: "At no time was it brought to our attention that Mr. McInnis used information not cited or unethically used work that was not his own."

She continued: "All work was represented to be original and final. . . . If the allegations are proven to be true, we will demand Mr. McInnis return all monies paid to him by the Foundation."

Dr. Malik Hasan, a foundation board member, also has said McInnis should return the money.

"All the articles are original"

McInnis has not disclosed whether he paid Fischer, how much he was paid and during what time period. McInnis also did not definitively answer questions about whether he would repay the $300,000.

"We'll make it right," he told 9News.

The Hasan Family Foundation paid McInnis $150,000 a year for a 24-month fellowship from 2005 through 2006. McInnis wrote 23 articles totaling 150 pages on water and public-land issues.

In a memo to Seeme Hasan, he said: "All the articles are original and not reprinted from any other source." He also said that the foundation had "the final form of the series."

McInnis now says he didn't intend the articles to be published until after he edited them one more time. They were not posted online by the foundation until after McInnis began his run for governor.

The new example shows clear similarities in both ideas and language between McInnis' 1994 column and his 1995 floor speech and the Washington Post piece. Allen and Plunk in the Op-Ed refer to an agreement between the U.S. and North Korea as "the beginning of the end of a perilous nuclear crisis."

The identical language is found in McInnis' column and floor speech. A search of the Nexis news database finds that the phrase was not used anywhere else in print beyond the Post and McInnis columns.

The Washington Post Op-Ed calls for the "North to resume substantive, high-level talks with Seoul immediately." That exact phrase is also used in McInnis' column and floor speech.

The 150 pages McInnis wrote during his fellowship also contain exact phrases first published two decades earlier.

Earlier Tuesday, House Speaker Terrance Carroll, D-Denver, called on McInnis to immediately drop out of the race, saying he "lacks the integrity" to be governor.

Duffy, the McInnis campaign spokesman, said the speaker is simply trying to distract voters from more important issues. "If I were Speaker Carroll and I had the legislative record that he had in terms of raising taxes and killing jobs, I'd want to change the subject too," he said.

Bar discipline possible

McInnis' opponent in the Republican primary, Dan Maes, said McInnis should take responsibility for the plagiarism.

"If your name is on it, you have to take ownership of it," he said.

Speaking with the Denver Post Editorial Board in advance of his State of the City address, McInnis' potential Democratic opponent, Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper, said that while he didn't know all the facts, the reports of plagiarism "create a cloud."

McInnis, a former congressman and a lawyer on leave from Hogan Lovells (formerly Hogan & Hartson), could face discipline from the Colorado Bar, said legal ethics professor Rebecca Aviel at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The rule covers attorney conduct even when it does not pertain to a client or particular case," she said, noting that the rules are "under enforced."

Clinton Guru Podesta' Brother Lobbied for Scandal-Ridden Uranium One

By: Ben Shapiro

If you love the team that put together the Clinton Foundation and all of its various corrupt dealings with foreign nations, you'll love the Hillary Clinton 2016 campaign. It now turns out that John Podesta, chair of Hillary's presidential campaign – and the same man who called the allegations of Peter Schweizer's Clinton Cash "conspiracy theories" – has a brother who runs a company, The Podesta Group, that lobbied the State Department on behalf of Uranium One while Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State and beyond.

Uranium One is, of course, the uranium firm that sent a "flow of cash" to the Clinton Foundation as the Russian government gained increasing ownership of the company; the State Department had to sign off on the Russians' encroachment into the American uranium market. The Clinton Foundation did disclose its relationship with Uranium One in Hillary's State Department disclosures. According to the Daily Caller, Uranium One "paid the Podesta Group $40,000 to lobby the State Department, the Senate, the National Park Service and the National Security Council for 'international mining projects,' according to a July 20, 2012 filing."

Hillary's relationship with John Podesta goes back to the first Clinton administration. During Bill Clinton's second term, Podesta acted as chief of staff. After leaving, he created the Center for American Progress, a Clinton-backed leftist think tank designed to forward the political goals of the Clintons. As the Christian Science Monitor reported when Podesta joined Hillary Clinton's campaign back in January:

Podesta is the guy people call on when the going gets tough: He served as Bill Clinton's chief of staff from 1998 to 2001, helping control a series of crises including Clinton's impeachment trial. The Obama administration brought him on to help the President steer a path through Congressional impasses and to avert embarrassments like the Affordable Care Act's botched rollout.

Podesta's relationship with the Clintons didn't waver during Hillary's time in the White House; his own ties with the Obama administration grew stronger when he became a senior advisor to the Obama administration in late 2013, before resigning this year to join Hillary's campaign.

Podesta isn't the only member of the Clinton team embroiled in Clinton Foundation corruption. Hillary's new top fundraiser is Dennis Cheng, the former chief development officer for the Clinton Foundation, which means he did all the fundraising for that organization. Cheng has not been asked any questions thus far about his relationship with the Clinton Foundation or the new Clinton 2016 campaign.

Just as President Obama magically transformed his campaign organization, Obama for America, into a political action group, Organizing for Action, to lobby for his preferred governmental policies, Hillary Clinton has transformed the Clinton Foundation and its constellation of allies into her 2016 campaign.

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- At least 10,000 ppl
- Lee Greenwood sings, Gretchen Wilson
- no overt negativity from the crowd

SARAH PALIN: When it comes to taxes, real choice on Nov 4th. My Opponent is not being candid. It is not mean spirit, not a negative campaign to call someone out on their records. Listen to my opponent's words, hiding agenda of redistributing hard earned money. Tax credit takes money to support government properties. We'll give a real tax cut, . Joe the plumber in Toledo. Good ol' Joe not alone in questioning Barack Obama's call to spread the wealth . Saw a sign, Ed the Dairyman, Karina the nurse, Tito Munos. He owns small construction company. We'll call him Tito the builder. Not happy how media have been roughing up Joe the Plumber. Tito wants to know why you're attacking Joe the plumber. Why is Joe being investigated an attacked for asking questions. He's an immigrant from Columbia. Says "everything is possible in America. Born in Columbia, made in the USA. Phil the bricklayer, rose the teacher If you work hard, want to get ahead, believe America is land of possibilities, don't like away opponents have attacked Joe, then you're Joe the plumber too. Barack the wealth spreader. Plan to redistribute wealth stifles entrepreneurial sprit that mad this country the greatest on earth. John and I have a different plan. Tax relief, lower income taxes, tax deduction for your family. Cut business gain tax, keep businesses in America. More American money in America. Set this nation on course for energy independence. Drill here and now (drill baby drill) you're right, drill baby drill, and mine baby mine. We need American resources brought by America ingenuity and brought to you by American workers. Choice between politician who has faith in the government, or a leader who puts faith in you. Choice between a redistributor, or creator of jobs and resources to get the economy back on track. So people like you can create new wealth. You have a choice between a leader who will not tolerate voter fraud. Ready to send to Washington to shake things up. Nov 4th, what we believe in, what john and I believe in was what Ronald Reagan. believed in. forward movement of freedom, not expansion of government. Not in dc, found her from courage of hard working Americans believe in promise of this country and opportunity. America is not the problem, America is the solution. We're not a perfect nation, but we learn from our mistakes. Beacon of hope, shining city on hill that Ronald Reagan used to speak of. Man who inspires us with heroic deeds, not just inspires us. Shake up Wall Street, win the war, asking for your vote. From now until election day, go on and on will fight for you. There is only one man on this campaign who has ever really fought for you. (john Mccain) and only one man with courage to keep on fighting for you.

JOHN MCCAIN: Grethchen Wilson thank you lee greenwood thank you. Wouldn't cindy make a great first lady Willow and Piper Palin. Those of you who don't know todd palin, 4 time world champion for sledding. He's' a great guy, he'll be great addition to our team.. I'm so grateful because we're going to win ohio on nov 4th. Thanks green high school and bulldogs. After months of trail eloquence, find out what wants to spread the wealth around. Believes in redistributing wealth, more interested in controlling who gets the piece of the pie than growing the pie. Cut taxes for 95% of Americans,. How do you reduce the number 0? Since you can't reduce income taxes for 0- tax credit, treasury will tax people including folks like Joe. Can I ask people involved in small business in Ohio. Thank you. Sarah Palin and I will not raise your taxes. The problem with Senator Obama's tax plan – ours far better at creating jobs and growing economy. Worst time for America, especially small businesses. Sudden tax hike for businesses will kill jobs McCain Palin tax cut is the real thing. Help create jobs and keep American businesses in America. As joe reminded us, didn't become greatest country on earth by spreading the wealth around. Next pres won't have time to get used to the office. Bring troops home in honor not defeat, we won't lose the war (usa) this weekend one of the more incredible moments that I observed. Senator Obama- Biden guaranteed if Obama is elected, will test the economy in crisis. American s already fighting for two wars. On board of USS enterprise, ready to go into combat at any moment, don't need o be tested, I am tested. (john mccain) I have been tested, senator obama hasn't. We've seem him wrong response- opposed surge in Iraq. Would sit down unconditionally with world's worst dictator. He's been wrong in all of these. My friends, we can't spend next four years like last eight. We need new direction, and we need to fight for it. Fighting for country , have scars to prove it. (thank you john) if I'm elected president, I'll shake up office . I'm ready for fight, not afraid of it. Won't spend your money to bailout wall street. Take care of people devastated by wall street. Buying up bad mortgages and refinancing them. We have to help Americans keep American dream. Buy up mortgages. Give new mortgage. Let retirees keep money in their savings longer. Create jobs, here at home. Raising taxes makes bad economy worse. Low taxes money in your hands and strengthen economy. If I'm elected, I mean when I'm elected president, when I ',m elected won't spend a trillion more of you r money he'll raise taxes and put us further into debt. I will freeze government spending except defense, vet care, social security. Ill veto every single ear mark pork barrel bill that comes to our office. No more bridges to nowhere, study dna of bears in montana. I won't make it harder to sell goods overseas. Make sure trade is free and fair. Help workers find jobs that won't go away. Senator Obama wants to raise taxes an restrict trade. Those who don't learn form history are doom to repeat them. I know my history. Stop sending money to countries that don't' like us very much. T eh debate the other night, you gotta pay attention to the words. He will "consider" offshore drilling. Whem I'm predent we'll drill here and now (drill baby drill) against drilling, building more nuclear plants in america. Encourage manufacture of flex fuel and automobiles. Lower cost of energy within months. Create millions of new jobs in the us of America. Less than two week sbefore election, we need a fight. Put all cards on table. Lets have some straight talk. I know you're worried, moment of national crisis. Will we lead economies or be overtaken. Will military be safest one in world will children future be better than our? Yes, we must be prepared to act swiftly. I'm American, I choose to fight. I have courage and fight. Fight corruption and end fighting in Washington. Fight to economy out of ditch. Fight for children's future. Stand up and fight. America is worth fighting before. We never give up , we make history..

Subject: [big campaign] MCCAIN OFFERS SAME FAILED BUSH FOREIGN POLICY

MCCAIN OFFERS SAME FAILED BUSH FOREIGN POLICY

McCain offers another term of failed Bush foreign policy. With the conflict in Afghanistan, the war in Iraq, and eight years of watching America's image in the world decline, Americans want no part of more dangerous McCain-Bush foreign policies.

McCain, like Bush, obsessed with Iraq, has neglected the war in Afghanistan.

McCain, like Bush, obsessed with Iraq. While talking to troops headed to Afghanistan in 2002, McCain said, "'Next up Baghdad!' [Associated Press, 1/9/02

2003: McCain said, "… in the long term, we may muddle through in Afghanistan." [John McCain, 11/5/03]

- MUST-SEE VIDEO: For anyone who missed it, here's McCain at the Council of Foreign Relations saying "in the long term, we may muddle through in Afghanistan." [John McCain, 11/5/03] To View: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Wazv45RYj60

McCain has attended zero hearings on Afghanistan over the last two years on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

McCain, Like Bush, Said Capturing Bin Laden Isn't ' that important.'

2002: McCain said capturing Osama Bin Laden Isn't "That Important." [CBS, "Face the Nation," 3/2/02]

McCain, Like Bush, has a bomb-first, talk-never approach to foreign policy.

McCain Foreign Policy Would Be a Dangerous Leap Backward. "There is a great deal about which the United States and Iran might talk - including trade, investment, tourism, and nuclear weapon nonproliferation. But none of those benefits will be achieved if the Bush policy of noncommunication is continued, and the United States, under McCain, returns to the pre-Kennedy days when the United States lacked the confidence to communicate with Mao Tse-tung or even shake hands with Ho Chi Minh, policies that garnered our country nothing but their hatred." [Boston Globe , 7/18/08]

McCain Thinks "The Way To Solve Problems Is Through The Military." David Gergen, former adviser to presidents Nixon, Ford, Reagan, and Clinton, said, "There's a sense that, with McCain, the way to solve problems is through the military." [Bloomberg, 3/31/08]

McCain "Hasn't Seen A Country He Doesn't Want To Bomb." According to Ivo Daalder, former National Security Council aide, "This is a man who hasn't seen a country he doesn't want to bomb or invade." [Bloomberg, 3/12/08]

McCain is Out of Touch with America on Foreign Policy.

Americans say US image important to security and military success. Nearly nine in 10 Americans (88 percent) believe that it is very important for other countries to have a favorable opinion of Americans.

Two-thirds of Americans (66 percent) believe that foreign governments will be less likely to support the United States' diplomatic and military efforts abroad;

More than six in 10 Americans (63 percent) worry that Americans will be less welcome in other parts of the world;

Six in 10 Americans (61 percent) worry that there is a greater likelihood of terrorist attacks in the US.

Americans agree Bush's failed foreign policy is responsible for US image problems in world. Three-quarters percent of Americans believe U.S. foreign policy is driving dissatisfaction with America abroad.

Bush-McCain Foreign Policy Has Destroyed US Image in World

2002 - America's image slips , although goodwill toward the United States remains

2003 - US image plunges in the wake of the Iraq war.

2004 - Further worsening of US image.

2005 - US image is still negative in most places. Anti-Americanism is increasingly entrenched.

2006 - US image back-slides even further.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Clinton takes a 'just enough' strategy to fundraising // AP // Julie Bykowicz and Ken Thomas – June 24, 2015

The stars are out to raise money for Hillary Rodham Clinton: Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett at the Plaza Hotel, Jon Bon Jovi at home in Jersey. So, too, are the Democratic Party's wealthiest donors, from a Facebook co-founder to the heiress of a brewing fortune.

Yet even as Clinton picks up the pace of fundraising this month, the front-runner for her party's presidential nomination is holding back in some ways — a "just enough" strategy that her supporters say will pay off over time.

The goal when she files her first fundraising report next month is to post a number that reassures Democrats she will have the resources to compete with the eventual Republican nominee, but doesn't chase away the small-dollar donors who would make up her strongest base of support in the general election.

"Her approach has been smart, disciplined and focused on the long-term," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist who worked with hedge fund billionaire Tom Steyer on one of Clinton's first fundraisers this year. Lehane said the 100-person reception sold out within 24 hours. "They easily could have put on a far bigger event of 1,000 people or more."

Clinton's supporters have tried to tamp down the expectations for the fundraising totals her campaign will disclose next month, when she and the other declared candidates for president will report how much they have raised through the end of June to the Federal Election Commission.

Unlike in 2008, Clinton is collecting money only for the primary contest, an amount capped at $2,700 per individual. If Clinton wins the Democratic nomination, she can return to her donors to ask for another $2,700 for the general election.

Since announcing her candidacy in mid-April, Clinton has raised at least $17 million, based on the number of people her campaign says have attended 49 fundraising events through Monday night. She held fundraisers Tuesday in Chicago and in St. Louis, where she raised money at Grant's Farm, a historic home owned by the Busch family, at an event hosted by beer heiress Trudy Busch Valentine.

Clinton is focused primarily on raising money for her actual campaign. Others have emphasized super PACs, which can accept donations of unlimited size but are prohibited from coordinating directly with the candidates they support. Republican Jeb Bush spent six months raising money for a super PAC before beginning traditional campaign fundraising. That approach has helped him amass as much as $100 million already.

Most of Clinton's fundraisers have also been smaller events at private homes, with audiences of no more than 250 people each giving the maximum. While backers says she could draw much larger crowds, many of the events have been half that size, putting the former secretary of state into what supporters say is her comfort zone.

"She was phenomenal," said John Morgan, a Florida attorney who hosted a 220-person reception last month at his home near Orlando. "She took a photo with every single guest."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The one-on-one time with donors, even if limited to a few minutes, is what inspires supporters to go beyond simply writing a check, Lehane said. "It's a re-investor approach. They'll go on to ask their friends to give."

Many of the biggest Democratic donors have already feted Clinton, or plan to in the next few weeks. Among them: billionaire Facebook co-founder Chris Hughes and Chicago media billionaire Fred Eychaner.

And she's relied upon celebrities, too. "Spiderman" star Tobey Maguire held a backyard event last week that raised $500,000. On Wednesday, she'll appear with Bennett and Lady Gaga in New York. Next week, Bon Jovi will perform at his New Jersey home for Clinton and some of her donors.

Her staunchest supporters say attendees at such events are leaving with a sense of purpose.

"People aren't just writing checks. They are raising, too," said Andy Spahn, who connects Democrats to Hollywood money and helped with one of Clinton's most lucrative fundraising trips so far, a May 7 visit to Los Angeles packed with morning, noon and night events.

Among small donors — those who give $200 or less, usually online — Clinton has competition. The campaign of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has suggested it has raised $8 million, with an average contribution amount of $40, through mid-June.

Yet Clinton is also applying some of the best practices of President Barack Obama, who raised almost 65 percent of the $33.2 million he collected in the first three months of his re-election campaign from small-dollar donors.

Her campaign this week has been promoting a raffle to attend dinner with Clinton. She is hawking cutesy souvenirs such as $30 red T-shirts that look like her go-to pantsuits. And the campaign has an array of $20 happy hours planned, including one Friday at Union Cafe in Columbus, Ohio.

Kiki McLean, a former 2008 Clinton campaign adviser, headlined a happy hour Tuesday night in Washington. McLean said she has no official role with the campaign, but said small events such as hers encourage involvement.

"I want to make sure they are up to speed on what they can do as volunteers," McLean said, "just like me."

Clinton's gay supporters: What enthusiasm gap? // Politico // Annie Karni – June 25, 2015

LGBT groups see a breakthrough — a Democratic front-runner who preaches full equality.

Hillary Clinton won't be marching in New York City's Pride Parade on Sunday in Manhattan, and she has no plans to march in any pride parades across the country, but her absence hasn't diminished the community's enthusiasm for her.

Indeed, many gay leaders are so on board for her campaign that they prefer she spend time building support elsewhere instead of marching alongside them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She’s a former secretary of state, and they’re coming up on fundraising deadlines,” said Beth Shipp, executive director of LPAC, the “lesbian super pac,” which endorsed Clinton in April, justifying Clinton’s absence. “She is getting pulled in all directions, by all sources. The fact that the campaign is putting up a presence at pride events, even without her there, is great.”

Clinton’s campaign is registered to participate in the New York parade, and top staffers and volunteers are planning to march, flying campaign banners. And on Saturday in New Hampshire, New York Rep. Sean Patrick Maloney, who grew up in Hanover and is the first openly gay person to be elected to Congress from New York, will host the kickoff event for the “LGBT Granite Staters for Hillary,” in Portsmouth.

With colleges out for the summer, and sought-after millennial voters harder to herd, pride events have become a golden summer opportunity for Clinton’s campaign to generate much-needed excitement. The LGBT community represents a unique group this election — for the first time, the country has shifted its views on same sex-marriage so a Democratic presidential front-runner can embrace a platform of full equality for all. And gay leaders have never been more eager to get on board in a big way.

“She’s really awesome,” gushed Shipp. “What other candidate have you ever seen put two same-sex couples in their announcement video? That set the bar for the community in a way that other campaigns have not done before.” Shipp said it was also meaningful to her that Robby Mook, Clinton’s campaign manager, is openly gay.

Clinton, who marched in the Pride Parade when she first ran for Senate, has long cultivated the gay vote. But her record of support for gay-rights issues, particularly during her husband’s presidency, was never ahead of her time — in 2000, Clinton said she did not support gay marriages. And in 2003, when asked about the Defense of Marriage Act, Clinton equivocated, saying through a spokesman that “this issue is in a state of evolution.”

This cycle, Clinton has said she supports a constitutional right for same-sex couples to marry — an evolution from a position she touted last year when she said same-sex marriage should be left to the states to decide. Her evolving record on the issue makes the LGBT community’s broad, seemingly universal embrace of her candidacy stand out all the more.

To some gays and lesbians, Clinton’s personal story — as a woman who has persevered despite obstacles and attacks — is inspiring. Others point to her gay friends. And still others acknowledge her less-than-perfect record on gay issues but accept the sincerity of her commitment this time around.

“There’s no question that Hillary has evolved on the issue of marriage and recognition of LGBT families,” said former New York City Council Speaker Christine Quinn, who is gay. “But you can say that about almost every progressive national leader. There were few national Democrats who five or 10 years ago were where I would have wanted them to be on this issue. What’s profound for me as it relates to [Clinton’s] evolution is that it’s a very personal evolution. I’ve always seen her working on this issue, listening, being with people who were LGBT.”

For Quinn, the more meaningful signal was the gay and lesbian couples featured in her announcement video: “It stood out like neon for me. It’s thrilling. It feels like such an enormous change and a huge step forward.”

The campaign has continued to make public signs of inclusion to the LGBT community. “You would be hard-pressed to embrace our community more aggressively than her campaign is,” Quinn said, pointing to the campaign changing its official Twitter avatar to a rainbow-colored “H” on the day the Supreme Court took up the case to decide whether same-sex couples have a constitutional right to marry.

On Tuesday, Clinton’s campaign released a new video, titled “Equal,” with footage of same-sex couples tying the knot. A voice-over features clips from Clinton’s kickoff speech and her 2011 speech in Geneva, where she declared that “gay rights are human rights and human rights are gay rights.” And Brynne Craig, the campaign’s deputy national political director, is in the final stages of hiring an LGBT outreach coordinator for the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign has also been successfully shoring up cash from the LGBT community.

Hillary Clinton marches along Fifth Avenue in Manhattan during the annual Gay and Lesbian Pride Parade in New York 25 June 2000.

Laura Ricketts, the openly gay co-owner of the Chicago Cubs, who in 2008 bundled money for Barack Obama, hosted a house party fundraiser for Clinton in Chicago last month. At a fundraiser in Washington, D.C., last month, Clinton spoke before a majority lesbian crowd, hosted by Claire Lucas and Judy Dlugacz, founders of a cruise line targeting gay women. On Wednesday night, gay icons Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett headlined Clinton's first large low-dollar fundraiser at the Plaza Hotel in Manhattan.

The online campaign store sells a $30 "Hillary Pride Tank," a "Pride bumper sticker pack" for $5, and the $30 "LGBTQ Vee."

Critics view Clinton's evolution on gay marriage as politically expedient, moving at the same time the whole country has dramatically shifted its views on the issue. Her supporters said it doesn't matter.

"One of her platforms is equality for all, which is not something we saw in 2008," said Eunic Ortiz, president of the Stonewall Democrats of NYC, which won't endorse any candidate until 2016. "The general feeling is she's a welcome voice for our community." Ortiz was willing to forgive Clinton's previous record on gay marriage. "It's something she has evolved on," said Ortiz. "This is now equality for all, and we are looking forward."

Quinn recalled meeting with Clinton during her 2000 run for New York Senate. A small group of elected officials and leading LGBT advocates gathered at the home of Jeff Soref, a major gay fundraiser, in Gramercy Park.

"[Clinton] spoke personally and powerfully about the gay couple who lived near her parents in Arkansas," Quinn recalled. The couple, Larry Curbo and Dillard Denson, are mentioned in Clinton's memoir "Living History" as dear friends of her father who helped break down his stereotypes about homosexuals. "I think they were literally with her father on his deathbed. Meeting those two men was a pivotal moment opening up her mind. To me that's what you want, for someone moving on this issue: coming at it from a personal perspective."

Clinton to miss convention of liberal activists, bloggers // AP // Ken Thomas – June 24, 2015

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Hillary Rodham Clinton isn't expected to show at an annual convention of liberal activists and bloggers often courted by Democratic presidential candidates.

Netroots Nation organizers said Wednesday that Democratic presidential candidates Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley have confirmed their attendance at the July 16-19 conference in Phoenix.

Clinton's campaign cited a scheduling conflict, with commitments in Iowa on July 17 and Arkansas on July 18. Sanders and O'Malley plan to speak at the Iowa dinner.

About 3,000 activists are planning to attend the Netroots Nation convention, which will also feature Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass. Many liberals had hoped she would challenge Clinton for the nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton remains the dominant Democratic candidate but one of her challenges in the primaries will be generating support among some liberals who have been hesitant to back her campaign, wary of her willingness to rein in Wall Street excess and her past support of trade deals.

Clinton last appeared at Netroots Nation in 2007 — then called Yearly Kos — at a presidential forum that also included then-Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and others.

She received a tepid response from activists, some of whom disapproved of her vote in favor of the 2003 invasion of Iraq and her acceptance of campaign contributions from lobbyists.

Raven Brooks, Netroots Nation's executive director, said the conference is hopeful the Clinton campaign "will reconsider addressing this core progressive community who are most eager to hear from her."

Brooks said former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee, a former Republican seeking the Democratic nomination, would not be invited to the event and organizers would monitor the presidential field to decide whether to invite others like former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, who is exploring a campaign.

Hillary Clinton's 'All Lives Matter' Remark Stirs Backlash // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 24, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton is facing backlash for saying that "all lives matter" in an African-American church in Missouri on Tuesday, offending some who feel that she is missing the point of the "black lives matter" mantra.

Mrs. Clinton's remarks at Christ the King United Church of Christ in Florissant, Mo. — only a few miles north of Ferguson, where a black teenager was shot by a white police officer last August — came during a broader discussion of civil rights in America.

She was talking about how a disproportionate number of young people of color are out of school and out of work and, explaining that everyone needs a "chance and a champion," she recalled how her mother was abandoned as a teenager and went on to work as a maid.

“What kept you going?” Mrs. Clinton remembered asking her mother. “Her answer was very simple. Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter.”

The remark caused a stir on social media, with some African-Americans on Twitter suggesting that Mrs. Clinton had lost their votes.

The Rev. Renita Lamkin, who was in the audience at the event, told NPR that Mrs. Clinton’s comment did not go unnoticed.

“That blew a lot of support that she may have been able to engender here,” she said.

The phrase “black lives matter” has become a rallying cry in the last year amid a spate of episodes around the country, including the 18-year-old Michael Brown’s death in the St. Louis suburb of Ferguson, where white police officers have been accused of using excessive force against black suspects.

Judith Butler, a professor at University of California, Berkley, summed up the frustration with the use of “all lives matter” in The Times in January.

“When some people rejoin with ‘All Lives Matter’ they misunderstand the problem, but not because their message is untrue,” she wrote. “It is true that all lives matter, but it is equally true that not all lives are understood to matter which is precisely why it is most important to name the lives that have not mattered, and are struggling to matter in the way they deserve.”

Mrs. Clinton has not been opposed to using the phrase in the past, declaring that “yes, black lives matter” at a gala in New York last year.

The controversy comes as Mrs. Clinton has sought to address racial issues in a more direct manner than she was able to in 2007, when she was running against someone who would go on to become the first black president.

Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist who is black, defended Mrs. Clinton and said that her remarks on Tuesday should be taken in the context that she was discussing her mother.

Bernie Sanders Gains on Hillary Clinton in Bloomberg Early-State Polling // Bloomberg // John McCormick - June 25, 2015

The results of simultaneous polls in Iowa and New Hampshire suggest a Democratic appetite for a Clinton rival and highlight potential vulnerabilities for the front-runner.

Bernie Sanders is gaining on Hillary Clinton in Iowa and New Hampshire, with an appeal as an issue-oriented protest vehicle potentially capable of slowing any coronation of the popular front-runner.

In simultaneous surveys, the U.S. senator from Vermont received nearly a quarter of support from likely Democratic caucus and primary voters in the states that host the first presidential nomination balloting early next year, cutting sharply into Clinton's still-huge lead.

The polls suggest substantive and symbolic support for the socialist, as well as a craving among some Democrats for a Clinton rival to rise.

“I want to try to get him along as far as I can,” said Democratic poll participant John Murphy, 74, a retired railroad worker in West Des Moines, Iowa. “He’s going to bring up some issues that she may not want to talk about.”

The surveys were commissioned to test sources of strength for Sanders, who has seen audiences at his campaign events swell in recent weeks. The polls were conducted June 19-22 by West Des Moines-based Selzer & Co. in Iowa and Washington-area Purple Strategies in New Hampshire, the latter done in cooperation with Saint Anselm College. The margin of error on the full samples—401 in Iowa, 400 in New Hampshire—is plus or minus 4.9 percentage points.

In Iowa, Clinton leads Sanders 50 percent to 24 percent, and in New Hampshire, 56 percent to 24 percent. That's a six- to eight-point increase in his support since those states were polled by Bloomberg Politics and partners in May.

With nearly identical support in Iowa and New Hampshire, the polls suggest Sanders' rise isn’t just because he enjoys New England neighbor-state status. In both states, he gets higher marks than Clinton on authenticity and willingness to take on Wall Street and financial elites.

Along the campaign trail, Sanders appears to be changing some minds: His unfavorable rating in Iowa is just 4 percent, down 8 percentage points since May. At the same time, 57 percent now view him positively, up 10 points from the last poll.

“You can make the case that a certain amount of Bernie Sanders’s support is a protest vote, but there’s more to it than that,” said J. Ann Selzer, president of Selzer & Co. “People like him. They like what he stands for. They like showing up at his events and hearing him say things they believe in.”

Clinton’s support has dropped by 7 points in Iowa and 6 points in New Hampshire. Among likely Democratic voters, she's viewed favorably by 88 percent in Iowa and 86 percent in New Hampshire. That's up two points since May in Iowa and unchanged in New Hampshire, and comparable to the popularity of her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Yet Sanders' team points to mounting evidence that the white-haired, sometimes seemingly grumpy senator could offer voters an appealing alternative to Clinton, a former U.S. secretary of state, senator, and first lady viewed as the overwhelming Democratic nomination front-runner.

“It's tremendous progress that he is making with voters in the first two states,” Tad Devine, Sanders' chief political strategist, said of the poll findings. “It's something we felt on the ground.”

While Sanders is indeed enjoying something of a mini-surge in the two states, the polls show he's almost certain to hit a ceiling eventually, said Purple Strategies' Doug Usher.

“Clinton remains enormously well-known and well-liked in New Hampshire, a state she won before,” Usher said. “She benefits from a gender gap in a primary that will be disproportionately female, and even Sanders’ voters admit Clinton is likely the nominee. As long as Democrats like both candidates simultaneously, Sanders will have an uphill climb."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The New Hampshire survey shows the race not as close there as a poll released last week by Suffolk University, which had Clinton at 41 percent and Sanders at 31 percent. Unlike the Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm poll, the Suffolk survey didn't start with a database of registered voters, instead relying more on the self-reported likelihood of voting in the primary. It also included Vice President Joe Biden, while this one didn't.

Clinton swamps Sanders on who can beat the Republican nominee in the general election, foreign-policy experience, and knowing how to get things done in Washington. The two find roughly equal support among likely Democratic voters on who will fight for average people and who will care for people like themselves. Depending on the state, Sanders has a 7- to 18-point edge on taking on Wall Street and a 12- to 17-point advantage on authenticity.

"His priorities are right and he's not going to just crumble under the status quo," said Anne Welch, 59, a caregiver who lives in Penacook, New Hampshire. "He won't compromise."

Welch, who once lived in Vermont and met Sanders, said she supported Clinton in 2008. "I kind of feel like I'm betraying my gender," she said.

Clinton's team has worked to dampen expectations, noting that it's rare for a Democratic candidate who isn't an incumbent president to win more than 50 percent in Iowa's caucuses. The goal is to try to avoid having her seen as a wounded front-runner should she fail to dominate the first contest. In 2008, she finished third in Iowa and her aura of inevitability was badly damaged by an insurgent Barack Obama.

That sense of inevitability is strong again in Iowa and New Hampshire, with four-fifths of likely Democratic voters in both states saying they think Clinton is destined to be the nominee. Even among supporters of Sanders, 69 percent of those in Iowa say she'll be the party's eventual nominee. Clinton's own Iowa supporters are even more confident, with 93 percent saying she'll be the standard-bearer. Her campaign declined to comment on these polls.

Among independents likely to participate in the Iowa caucuses—about a fifth of the probable electorate—Sanders leads Clinton, 35 percent to 29 percent. In May, she led with that group by 19 points. (The margin of error is higher in subgroups like these.)

Women in Iowa are much more likely to back Clinton than men are, 59 percent to 39 percent. Among women, she leads Sanders 59 percent to 19 percent, while it's much narrower advantage among men, 39 percent to 30 percent.

While some Democrats and independents are welcoming Sanders to the race with their support, it doesn't mean they're rejecting Clinton.

Almost nine in 10 who are supporting Sanders in New Hampshire, and 83 percent in Iowa, say they're backing him because of what he stands for. Just 13 percent in Iowa and 9 percent in New Hampshire say their decision is because they don't want Clinton to get the nomination, or because they want to send her a message.

Matthew Cook, 27, who just completed a physics degree and lives in Waterloo, Iowa, said Sanders has been "a really consistent politician, which is hard to find." He plans to vote for Sanders if for no reason other than to push Clinton on the issues he cares most about, including gay marriage, climate change, and fair trade.

Democrats Try to Force Republicans to Release Clinton Confidant Testimony // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 24, 2015

Democrats on the House panel investigating the September 11, 2012 attacks in Benghazi are invoking a "right" they say permits them to force a public committee vote on releasing Hillary Clinton confidant Sidney Blumenthal's closed-door testimony.

The five Democrats are making the demand in a letter dated Wednesday to the committee chairman Trey Gowdy of South Carolina.

Led by Elijah Cummings of Maryland, the Democrats write that the panel's deposition procedures, as adopted by the House, allow them to require the committee to "promptly schedule a public business meeting to consider, debate and vote on the proposal to release Sidney Blumenthal's deposition transcript."

They say release of a transcript of Blumenthal's closed-door testimony "will resolve public disagreements that have arisen from the selective-and sometimes inaccurate-descriptions of his testimony and his emails that have appeared in the press."

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the committee's Republican majority, accused the Democrats of spurning Gowdy's offer to discuss the issue. "Chairman Gowdy atempted to schedule a meeting," Ware said in a statement, "but the Democrats chose to send out a press release instead." He noted that Blumenthal is being treated just like every other person who has testified. "The committee has not released the transcript of any other witness and the chairman is not inclined to treat this witness differently," Ware said.

Blumenthal was called to give a closed-door deposition last week about memos and advice on Libya he sent then-Secretary of State Clinton prior to the attacks on the U.S. facilities in which four Americans were killed.

Since then, there have been leaks to the media about his emails to Clinton about Libya and Benghazi when she was secretary of state. The committee released 60 of those missives last week, but not any of Blumenthal's testimony. The committee Democrats, and Blumenthal's lawyer, James Cole, have complained some of those have given an inaccurate account of what occurred in the deposition.

In their letter, the committee Democrats say that the procedure for releasing depositions is specifically spelled out in a committee rule. They say it reads: "The chair and ranking minority member shall consult regarding the release of depositions. If either objects in writing to a proposed release of a deposition or a portion thereof, the matter shall be promptly referred to the Select Committee for resolution."

"It appears that all of the prerequisites have been filled," the Democratic lawmakers wrie, which notes Democrats began asking for the public release of the Blumenthal transcript last week.

"Since all of the steps have been fulfilled as required by the Deposition Procedures adopted by the House, we request that you promptly schedule a business meeting of the Select Committee so Members may consider, debate, and vote on this important matter," they write.

Should Political Campaigns Stop Using Free Labor? // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse – June 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carolyn Osorio, who graduated in 2013 from Pratt Institute, seems to be a one-woman weapon against the axiom of apathetic millennials: She's a young person of political passion. In an op-ed column published Wednesday in USA Today, she describes high-school nights spent sleeping in a Hillary for America t-shirt and tears shed upon Clinton's concession to Barack Obama.

When Clinton announced her intention to seek the presidency in 2016, Osorio practically vaulted on board. "I quickly applied for and was offered a position as a Hillary for America fellow to work on the campaign," she writes. "I couldn't have been more excited — until I was told I'd have to move to Nevada and work full time on my own dime."

Hillary Clinton's young campaign prides itself on a kind of thriftiness. Her campaign manager Robby Mook has reportedly boasted to donors and staff alike that he is "really, really cheap." Staff members, according to the Washington Post, are using personal cellphones for work. And the other day, campaign chairman John Podesta got from Manhattan to D.C. by Vamoose bus: a $30 ride. He called it "solidarity."

This may be what the candidate herself was going for, in her decision to road trip from New York to Iowa in a clunky van called "Scooby," as soon as her campaign officially launched. Nowadays, she's mostly flying commercial.

Since Osorio graduated from college, with a degree in art theory, criticism, and history, she hasn't found a job. "Two straight years of unemployment," she writes. She hoped that Clinton would at least pay the people who work for her (and not short hours) the minimum wage. "I had hoped a trailblazer would be more willing to break the mold of indentured servitude that haunts my generation," Osorio writes. "Finding out that Hillary perpetuates the exploitation known as unpaid internships was like discovering that Santa wasn't real."

Osorio points to a broader issue: What kind of a job is it, to pitch in on a political campaign? And shouldn't remuneration be explicit?

"We're thrilled to welcome volunteers for the summer, just like other campaigns in both parties have done in the past," Jesse Ferguson, a spokesperson for Clinton, wrote to me by e-mail. "Many successful fellows from a similar program during the Obama campaign now work with us on this campaign and we're sure the same will be true with many from this group. The latest evidence of the intense grassroots interest in Hillary Clinton's campaign comes from the tremendous interest in our fellows program."

Clinton's camp has lately received a spate of negative attention for the reliance on "free labor." But its practices are far from unusual. Volunteers and interns are the backbones of the modern political campaign. Obama's team had this kind of program in both 2008 and 2012, and it helped them dominate. The Republican National Committee has launched a similar program to train volunteers and staffers, perhaps as a kind of catchup.

Osorio says she'll vote for Clinton anyway, but she believed she would be paid.

Rachel Bien, a lawyer who specializes in low-wage labor at Outten & Golden, said these kinds of presumptions or implications matter when courts evaluate the totality of the circumstances in determining whether a position is volunteer, or a job. "To the extent that the relationship looks more like an employment relationship because you have to complete an application, you're screened, you're meeting prerequisites, it looks more like a job or employment situation than a volunteer position that's open to anyone who wants to volunteer regardless of background, education, situation, etcetera," she said by phone Wednesday.

Michael Harper, a scholar of labor relations at the Boston University School of Law, sees political volunteering as elementally different from regular employment. "It would be inappropriate to apply the standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act to voluntary activity on political campaigns – which is First Amendment activity that we don't want to monetize," he said.

Neither Harper nor Bien knew of exact precedent in the legal system, when it came to volunteers. But Bien mentioned the Supreme Court ruling in 1985, in Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor, in which the Department of Labor found that the religious organization had violated the minimum wage, overtime, and record-keeping provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act even though the volunteers considered themselves volunteers; the conditions of their compensation—food, clothing, shelter, and other benefits—made it an employment relationship.

"The government has created a whole lot of exceptions for itself," Bien said. Osorio herself, in her column, acknowledges how common unpaid work is in the political industry. "At the same time the administration was cracking down on unpaid internships in the private sector, it continued not paying the 300 annual interns in the White House," she wrote.

Bien said she considers the matter Osorio raises "really problematic—especially coming from someone like Hillary Clinton who has been really supportive of min wage laws and has publicly called on businesses to pay interns. When you have young people—many of whom can't find employment, as Hillary recognizes—working long hours, day in and day out, to help, at the end of the day someone needs to be supporting them. The burden otherwise falls on family or the government."

"I hope that Hillary will reconsider what she's doing her and will pay her interns," she said. "It would set a great precedent."

Clinton's Fundraising Rounds Include Law Firms: Business of Law // Bloomberg // Ellen Rosen – June 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton's fundraising schedule for the next two weeks is nothing but hectic. And, as Bloomberg Politics reports, among the 26 events she's set to attend between June 22 and July 3, at least two involve law firms.

She is scheduled to be at a Wednesday afternoon fundraiser hosted by Sullivan & Cromwell LLP and at another on June 30 hosted by Julissa Reynoso, a former U.S. ambassador to Uruguay who's now a partner at Chadbourne & Parke LLP, according to invitations obtained by Bloomberg. George Pataki, one of the Republicans seeking his party's nomination, is counsel at Chadbourne.

Campaign spokesman Josh Schwerin declined to comment on the number of fundraisers Clinton has scheduled. Many events come with a recommended contribution of the $2,700 legal maximum for her primary campaign or require attendees to raise at least $27,000.

After the quarter ends, the Clinton campaign, like all the others, must file disclosures with the Federal Election Commission.

Forty-Four Firms Meet 'Gold Standard' of Women's Prominence

The Women in Law Empowerment Forum has released its list of big firms that meet their "gold standard." This year, 44 have met four of the group's six requirements, the minimum needed for the accolade.

Those criteria are that women are: 20 percent of U.S. equity partners or, alternatively, one-third of non-lateral attorneys that became U.S. equity partners within the previous 12 months; 10 percent of firm chairs and managing partners; 20 percent of the primary governance committee; 20 percent of the compensation committee or its equivalent; 25 percent of the U.S. practice group leaders and department heads; and 10 percent of the top half of U.S. equity partners in terms of compensation.

Eight firms met all six benchmarks: Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner LLP; Hogan Lovells LLP; Holland & Hart LLP; Littler Mendelson PC; Reed Smith LLP; Schiff Hardin LLP; Shook, Hardy & Bacon LLP; and Sutherland Asbill & Brennan LLP.

The other 36 firms are: Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz PC; Ballard Spahr LLP; Bryan Cave LLP; Cooley LLP; Davis Polk & Wardwell LLP; Davis Wright Tremaine LLP; Dentons US; DLA Piper LLP (US); Dorsey & Whitney LLP; Faegre Baker Daniels LLP; Haynes & Boone LLP; Hughes Hubbard & Reed LLP; Jackson Lewis PC; K&L Gates LLP; Kilpatrick Townsend & Stockton LLP; Latham & Watkins LLP; Lathrop & Gage LLP; Manatt, Phelps & Phillips LLP; McCarter & English LLP; McKenna Long & Aldridge LLP; Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP; Norton Rose Fulbright US LLP; Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP; Paul Hastings LLP; Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP; Perkins Coie LLP; Polsinelli PC; Quarles & Brady LLP; Shearman & Sterling LLP; Sidley Austin LLP; Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP; Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP; Steptoe & Johnson LLP; Stinson Leonard Street LLP; Stoel Rives LLP; and Thompson Coburn LLP.

The Above the Law blog noted that six of the firms -- Cooley; Fulbright & Jaworski, now Norton Rose Fulbright; Paul Hastings; Reed Smith; Shook Hardy; and Sutherland Asbill -- had the highest percentage of women on their management committees, based on 2013 data from the American Lawyer.

LG Settles With Conservation Groups Over New Jersey Headquarters

LG Electronics Inc. reached a settlement with several conservation groups, allowing the company's U.S. unit to build a $300 million headquarters in Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, after amending the design.

Opponents had said the building would ruin views of the Palisades, a 200-million-year-old stretch of rocky wilderness above the western shore of the Hudson River.

The new design will retain the project's scale while protecting the views, LG said in a statement Tuesday. Under the settlement, the conservation groups agreed to withdraw litigation challenging zoning approvals.

The groups include the Natural Resources Defense Council, the New Jersey State Federation of Women's Clubs, the New Jersey Conservation Foundation, the New York-New Jersey Trail Conference and Scenic Hudson, a Poughkeepsie, New York-based preservation group.

Laurance Rockefeller, an environmental lawyer whose family donated the land 80 years ago that became the basis for Palisades Interstate Park, took part in the settlement talks.

The new design for the building calls for a five-story north wing almost 70 feet (21 meters) high and a three-story south wing. LG will also use landscape, lighting and other design features to reduce visual impact on the park, a National Natural and Historic Landmark.

The project has been in the works since 2009, but was delayed by two lawsuits challenging zoning approvals. Both suits were dismissed by a New Jersey Superior Court judge in August 2013; that decision was on appeal.

GOP 2016's battle for second fundraising war // CNN // Sara Murray, Theodore Schleifer, and Tom LoBianco – June 24, 2015

The money race for second place is on.

With a June 30 fundraising deadline drawing near, speculation over how much money Republican presidential candidates will collect is reaching a fever pitch. It's already clear that Jeb Bush will come out on top regardless of whether he hits or even surpasses the $100 million target many in the donor world set for the former Florida governor. The more interesting question, many donors and campaign operatives say, is who will come in second.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker has an unusually broad donor list thanks to his highly publicized recall election and big dollar backers like Chicago Cubs co-owner Todd Ricketts. Florida Sen. Marco Rubio has worked meticulously to make inroads with prominent GOP fundraisers who aren't sold on Bush. And Texas Sen. Ted Cruz has drawn in small dollar donors, as well as the support of a handful of super PACs. A leader of the super PACs backing Cruz expects those groups and the official campaign committee to raise a combined $50 million by the end of the week.

"When it comes to fundraising in a presidential race, it's the expectation game," said Craig Robinson, a GOP activist in Iowa and editor of The Iowa Republican website. "Every candidate has a different bar they're going to have to clear."

The price tag to wage a competitive primary campaign is likely to come in well below $100 million. Republican fundraisers said if a candidate and allied groups can raise $10 million to $20 million by the end of the month, they will be viewed as credible rivals.

Anthony Scaramucci, the founder of SkyBridge Capital who is supporting Walker, said he expects Walker to raise $15 million to $22 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There's a number that's enough and there's a number that's not enough," Scaramucci said. "The $20 million number is enough."

The best-positioned candidates should plan to barrel into Iowa with $20 million to $40 million in the bank between their campaign accounts and their super PACs, GOP strategists said.

A candidate could win the Iowa caucuses with as little as $2 million, Robinson said. And in New Hampshire, "there's sort of a practical limit on how much TV time you can buy," said Tom Rath, a GOP operative there.

But a bitter faceoff in Florida -- the home state of Bush and Rubio -- is a much more expensive proposition.

It could cost $20 million to $30 million, said Miami-Dade Republican Party Chairman Nelson Diaz, for candidates to cover the four major media markets and adapt to a new primary system due to the timing of the Florida contest. All of the state's delegates will be awarded to the winner of the March 15 primary, the earliest possible date when states can do so rather than divvying them up proportionally.

"Only one of them survives the encounter in Florida," said Steve Schmidt, who was the senior strategist for Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign in 2008.

All of this requires not only strong fundraising, but also disciplined spending. That's particularly true for Bush and Rubio. While other candidates may chart their course to victory by investing heavily in a single state, both contenders from Florida are expected to compete in several states simultaneously.

"Obviously we want to raise as much as we can and then be very careful about how we spend it," said Rubio spokesman Alex Conant. "We're not going to raise as much as the others."

Rubio will spend the rest of the month crisscrossing the country to average roughly one fundraiser a day. He'll do most of that on commercial flights while a lean staff keeps his campaign headquarters humming.

At a recent Bush fundraiser in Washington, donors forked over $2,700 per person to stand around tables munching on potato chips and croissant finger sandwiches as organizers sought to keep event overhead costs low.

"We understand that we're going to have to compete everywhere and that we're going to need the resources to compete everywhere," said Tim Miller, a spokesman for the Bush campaign. That requires building a campaign operation that's flush with cash and ready to spring into action when a number of states hold their contests on March 1.

The leader of Cruz's super PACs said the structure -- four separate organizations largely controlled by three donors -- allows them to minimize costs by tapping donors' own professional networks.

"Everybody thinks this structure, as it relates to us, is somehow limiting our capacity and there's a chokehold -- actually it's the opposite," said the group's leader. "I'm not going to have to buy a whole bunch of computers that I throw away at the end of this deal."

Candidates' overall fundraising totals will receive plenty of attention, but Republicans cautioned that every dollar isn't created equally. Many candidates will be able to stretch their dollars further than Bush, who has the biggest target on his back and will have to combat fatigue from his family name.

Frank VanderSloot, a GOP fundraiser in Idaho and chief executive of wellness company Melaleuca, said he views Bush, Walker and Rubio as the top tier of GOP candidates. At the moment, Rubio is his favorite.

Bush faces a tougher path because of his family legacies, VanderSloot said. At a recent board meeting for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Mr. VanderSloot said some business executives confessed they were uncomfortable with the idea of "crowning" another Bush president.

"There's a general feeling of we don't have a monarchy here," Mr. VanderSloot said.

Bush's unique hurdles help explain why he and his allies are pressing donors for big contributions right up to the fundraising deadline.

After wrapping up his official announcement in Florida, Bush hopped on a call with his finance director and donors and prodded them to give to his official campaign account, according to someone familiar with the call. Dave Kochel, the campaign's senior strategist, assured fundraisers that Bush would be a formidable competitor in the early states.

The super PAC supporting Bush has been making similar moves. On a call last week, Mike Murphy, who is running the group, encouraged donors to keep up their fundraising so he could "weaponize" their total.

Hillary Clinton to skip major progressive event // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton will not attend the Netroots Nation liberal organizing conference next month due to a scheduling conflict, organizers confirmed to msnbc, skipping the marquee annual progressive gathering for a second year in a row.

Fellow Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders will both hold town hall style meetings at the conference scheduled for July 16-19 in Phoenix, Arizona. Clinton will be holding events that weekend in Iowa and Arkansas.

"Our campaign looks forward to earning the support of the Democrats participating in this conference but Hillary Clinton has scheduling conflicts which will prevent her from attending. She wishes them the best on their conference," said Clinton campaign spokesperson Jesse Ferguson.

Former Sen. Jim Webb was not invited because he has not declared whether he will run for the Democratic nomination. Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee, who was a Republican until 2013 and joined the 2016 presidential race as a Democrat, was also not invited.

"We don't have plans to invite Chafee," said Netroots Nation executive director Raven Brooks. "We're going to continue to look at the field as it evolves but since it is a town hall format we don't want to steal time from the candidates we have on board just to be inclusive."

Netroots, originally started by DailyKos founder Markos Moulitsas to organize online opposition to the Iraq War, is perhaps the largest annual gathering of progressive movement activists in the country, and often attracts Democratic candidates and officeholders.

Clinton was invited to attend last year as well, but did not. Sen. Elizabeth Warren gave the keynote address and the super PAC Ready for Warren used the speech to kick off their effort to draft the senator.

With Warren still refusing to consider a White House bid, Ready for Warren recently decided to switch their allegiance to Sanders, who has quickly become a favorite of progressive activists.

Clinton attended the conference in 2007, along with most of the other Democratic presidential candidates that year, including Barack Obama. Her campaign offered a top level surrogate to speak on her behalf this year, but organizers wanted attendees to hear from the candidates themselves.

The AP first reported the news that Clinton would not be attending.

Hillary Clinton's 3-Word Misstep: 'All Lives Matter' // NPR // Tamara Keither – June 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton's speech Tuesday at a historic black church in Missouri was mostly well-received by the audience, but three words angered some of the activists she was hoping to appeal to.

Clinton spoke to frequent applause about religion, racism, access to education, repairing communities and the shooting last week in Charleston, S.C.

The church where Clinton spoke, Christ the King United Church of Christ, is in Florissant, Mo., fewer than 5 miles from where the rioting and protesting happened in Ferguson.

But she's now facing criticism on social media after using the phrase "all lives matter" — which has been used by some as pushback to the phrase "black lives matter." The latter phrase, which hung on a banner outside the church, was widely used by protesters in Ferguson and other cities.

Before using the phrase, Clinton was retelling an anecdote about the lessons she learned from her mother.

"I asked her, 'What kept you going?' Her answer was very simple. Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter."

To some in the pews, what Clinton said fell flat. Or worse:

"With her statement that all lives matter, that blew a lot of support that she may have been able to engender here," said Renita Lamkin, a pastor at the St. John AME Church in St. Charles. She is white and while protesting in Ferguson was hit in the gut with a rubber bullet. Her passion comes in part because her children are African-American.

"My children matter," she said. "And I need to hear my president say that the lives of my children matter. That my little black children matter. Because right now our society does not say that they matter. Black lives matter. That's what she needs to say."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's campaign points out she did say "black lives matter," late last year. But that didn't stop a flood of complaints on Facebook and Twitter after Clinton's speech:

Gabrielle Kennedy, also in audience at the church, had a more charitable reaction.

"I knew when she said it that there would be people who would not be happy with that. But I am of the belief that it's a process," she said.

'It Takes Time'

In nearby Ferguson, burned-out businesses are still boarded up on West Florissant Avenue. Charles Davis, owner of the Ferguson Burger Bar, counts his blessings.

"We were saved by God. Nothing happened to us," Davis said.

But business still isn't back to where it was. And neither is the community. Ferguson is trying to heal from the wound ripped open when a black 18-year-old was shot by a white police officer.

"It takes time. A year is not long enough. But what people should understand is a lot of changes that needed be made has been made," he said.

Many of the activists who rose up after the shooting of Michael Brown were on hand when Clinton spoke.

She spoke about the recent shooting in Charleston, and asked, "How do we make sense of such an evil act? An act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God?" Clinton also praised the ability of the families of the victims to look at the accused gunman and offer forgiveness.

After her speech, still in front of an audience, Clinton sat down for an hourlong discussion with community leaders. Kennedy, who was there, gives Clinton credit for coming to Missouri and listening.

"What you saw on that stage there, in the pulpit area there, how we take care of ourselves. This is us doing us, and it's fabulous stuff," Kennedy said.

A pastor delivered a final prayer before Clinton left. And in it, she called for this to be the beginning of a conversation. Not the end.

The Race That Defined Hillary's Strategy // The Daily Beast // David Freelander – June 25, 2015

How Terry McAuliffe's campaign for governor of Virginia was a dummy run for 2016.

Commonwealth since 2013 when she headlined a rally for Terry McAuliffe, a longtime friend vying to become governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Virginia has a hold on Hillary.

That's because the playbook for Clinton to win the presidency in 2016 was written in that race, which saw McAuliffe eke out a closer than expected victory against Ken Cuccinelli, the sitting attorney general and a hero to Virginia tea partiers.

Many of the same people that carried McAuliffe to victory are trying to do the same for Clinton. There is Robby Mook, Clinton's well-regarded campaign manager. Josh Schwerin, who works on rapid response out of Brooklyn, served as McAuliffe's press secretary. The campaign's political director, field director and research director have all found jobs with Team Clinton.

And many of the operatives who battled against them have gone on to the various Republican campaigns vying for the chance to take on Clinton. Danny Diaz, a senior strategist for Cuccinelli, was recently named Jeb Bush's campaign manager. Chris LaCivita, another top aide, is now helping lead Rand Paul's campaign. Wesley Donehue, who ran Cuccinelli's digital operation, is close to Marco Rubio.

Now, Team Clinton is set to take the strategy that won them a medium-sized state in a low-turnout, off-year election, and take it national, while Republicans are pouring over that same playbook and looking for holes.

Every campaign is unique, but McAuliffe in 2013 and Clinton in 2015 face a similar set of challenges. Back then, McAuliffe was trying to come back from an embarrassing defeat in a Democratic primary four years earlier, much as Clinton is now.

McAuliffe was a longtime front-person for the Clinton operation, and so he was relatively well known among voters. In order to reintroduce him to Virginians, the campaign embarked on a low-key listening tour of the forgotten corners of the state, where McAuliffe heard voter concerns while scribbling notes—much as Clinton did with her campaign rollout this spring.

"I think you see a lot of similarities," said one Republican who worked on the race. "McAulifffe was a Democrat who was trying to run a, 'Oh, just ignore my political past, ignore my scandal, ignore all of the background noise,' a lot like Clinton is trying to do now. And whoever the Republican is is going to have the same kind of ideological edge that Ken had."

And, like McAuliffe, Clinton faces historical headwinds. For four decades, Virginia had followed a pattern of electing governors someone from the party that had lost White House the year before; McAuliffe was the first to break that pattern.

Clinton's team, meanwhile, acknowledges that one of her biggest hurdles will be overcoming the pattern of voters looking to a new party for leadership after two terms in the White House by the opposing party.

Both trends are not merely historical oddities, strategists say, but evidence that voters are often looking for change and tire quickly of the ruling party. If ties to Obama could prove problematic for Clinton, the botched rollout of the Obamacare website—a law, it should be noted, that McAuliffe loudly championed—nearly finished McAuliffe.

In order to counteract the gathering clouds of bad news, the McAuliffe operation put a premium on data and organizing. It's much the same with Clinton now, who has pledged to put organizers in every state and who is counting on a data operation that surpasses event the sophistication of what the Obama team put together in 2012.

"I don't think Republicans realize yet how we are able to get turnout in places in places that are favorable to us," said one veteran of the race.

McAuliffe avoided a primary (not unlike Clinton, who is so far avoiding a competitive one) but still took strikingly liberal positions on social issues regardless. This is proof, Democratic veterans of his campaign say, that the center of the electorate is shifting rapidly away from the Republicans.

Clinton is trying the same strategy, staking out liberal positions on gay rights, immigration, the economy and the environment with the belief that the center of the electorate is far closer to the Democratic base on these matters.

But the governor's race was not one in which the Democrats touted McAuliffe much; rather, they made the race all about Cuccinelli, an unabashed conservative who bragged of his record of suing the federal government and who opposed gay marriage and abortion. This did not make for a particularly joyful campaign, with Time Magazine branding it "The Dirtiest, Nastiest, Low-Down Campaign in America."

"What is significant is that McAuliffe was able to win it even with pretty low turnout, and he did it because the Republicans gave him a far right candidate and he was relentless on the social issues," said Larry Sabato, the director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics. "This is a transferable issue in 2016, and one that Republicans are vulnerable on, no question about it."

McAullife, he added, was merely, "the non-Cuccinelli on the ballot. And if Hillary Clinton wins, it is for the same reason that McAuliffe wins—not because they are exciting or because people love them but because they are the other guy on the ballot."

Although Cuccinelli lost by a little over two points, Republicans say that he outperformed expectations. Polls in the final weeks of the race had Cuccinelli down by close to ten. He was outspent by $15 million dollars, and swamped on the airwaves in the race's final weeks.

But Republicans from around the country have highlighted an exit poll that showed him beating McAuliffe among voters age 18-24. Republicans say this is proof that the youngest cohort of the millennial generation is less focused on social issues and less likely to vote Democratic when Obama is not on the ballot.

But it wasn't enough. And the main lesson Republicans took from the near-upset hold has to do with the primary. Cuccinelli became the GOP nominee after conservatives grabbed hold of the nominating process and elbowed aside a far more mainstream alternative. A very winnable race became a loss after Cuccinelli never attempted to try to bridge the party's divide.

What Republicans should learn from the race is to make sure they "get a better candidate," said Tom Davis, a Republican former Congressman from the northern part of the state.

"We had a lot of advantages in that contest, but Republicans keep doing too good of a job of bringing out the Democratic base."

The Clinton-Confederate Flag Conspiracy Theory Is a New Low // Daily Beast // Patricia Murphy – June 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Out of the swirl of chaos, grief, grace, and courage that has followed the Charleston shooting, partisan politics has mostly kept its rightful place nowhere near the state of South Carolina.

But the national debate over the future of the Confederate flag that flies in front of the state's capitol has unwittingly given rise to one of the more bizarre Clinton conspiracy theories to date: that Bill and Hillary Clinton, despite decades as civil rights advocates and their right-wing caricature as Northeast liberal elites, are closet Confederate sympathizers.

The meme took off on Sunday, when The Daily Caller ran a story under the headline "Flashback: Bill Clinton Honored the Confederacy on Arkansas State Flag."

The next morning, the hosts of Fox & Friends debated whether Hillary Clinton had refused to denounce the Confederate flag flying in front of the South Carolina (though she actually did denounce it in 2007) out of loyalty to her husband, who, Elisabeth Hasselbeck said, "signed a law honoring the Confederacy in Arkansas and about the flag's design in 1987…that stated, 'the blue star is to commemorate the Confederate states of America."

The legislation that The Daily Caller, Fox & Friends, and now dozens of conservative blogs are referencing was a bill to make the flag that Arkansas had flown since 1924 the state's official flag. That flag includes four stars, three to symbolize the countries that held the Arkansas territory—Spain, France and the United States—and the fourth, as Hasselbeck said, "to commemorate the Confederate states of America."

Nowhere in the state's legislative history does it explain why the 63-year-old flag needed to be made official, but Arkansas historians have two explanations. First, the legislature was moving to give the state a number of "official" designations—think "official state butterfly," "official state grain"—as it celebrated its sesquicentennial.

Second, Bill Clinton and the state legislature were in the process of pushing through a series of measures to ban flag desecration as the U.S. Supreme Court debated and eventually struck down the 48 state laws against flag burning, including Arkansas's ban. Historians told me they believed the 1987 flag bill was passed to specify the official design of the state flag in conjunction with that effort. As governor, Clinton later signed a bill making it a crime to burn or deface a flag, a move that drew vocal complaints from the American Civil Liberties Union.

It is true that Clinton did nothing in his time as governor to remove the state flag's reference to Arkansas's role in the Confederacy. But by all accounts, the bill he signed making the state's flag official was not created as a Confederate memorial. The sponsor of the bill, longtime Arkansas legislator W.D. "Bill" Moore, has since died, but former Rep. Steve Smith said, "I served with Bill Moore in the early 1970s, and he was hardly a neo-Confederate. Nor was Bill Clinton."

In 2007, Hillary Clinton said she thought South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag from the capitol grounds entirely, not just from the front of the capitol.

The more recent Clintonian history related to the Confederate flag is easier to find and may be one of the more straightforward positions either Clinton has ever taken. Both have been consistently, unambiguously against its use.

During Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign, he endorsed then-Georgia Gov. Zell Miller's fruitless attempt to remove the St. Andrews Cross from the Georgia state flag, a change that eventually came nine years later, and made Miller the keynote speaker at his 1992 Democratic National Committee nominating convention.

In 2000, as South Carolina wrestled with the future of the Confederate flag that still flew above its capitol, then-President Clinton gave the state his unsolicited advice during a visit to Allen University, a historically black college in Columbia, S.C., just miles from the state capitol: Take the flag down. "As long as the waving symbol of one American's pride is the shameful symbol of another American's pain, we have bridges to cross in this country and we better get across them,"' he told the students.

When Hillary Clinton became a candidate for president herself in 2007, she said much the same thing during her own visit to the state, telling the AP she thought South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag from the capitol grounds entirely, not just from the front of the capitol.

And Tuesday, after South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley's call to finally remove the Confederate flag from the capitol grounds in the wake of the Charleston tragedy, Hillary Clinton called it the right thing to do.

"I appreciate the actions begun yesterday by the governor and other leaders of South Carolina to remove the Confederate battle flag from the State House, recognizing it as a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our present or our future," Clinton said. "It shouldn't fly there, it shouldn't fly anywhere."

There are more than enough reasons for members of the conservative media to be dubious about the Clintons: the deleted emails, the paid speeches, the Friends of Bill you thought went away with the Y2K bug but were actually just sitting on the Clinton Foundation payroll waiting for the next Clinton administration to begin.

But accusing either Clinton of being a Confederate sympathizer, past or present, is a conspiracy beneath even its creators.

Bill Clinton To The United Daughters of the Confederacy // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski and Christopher Massie – June 24, 2015

As president, Bill Clinton sent a number of letters to the United Daughters of the Confederacy, the society of female descendants of veterans of the Confederate army.

The organization, founded in 1894, has sponsored a number a Confederate memorials throughout the south, including memorials to General Robert E. Lee and General Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" Jackson in the National Cathedral. In the past, articles in the group's magazine argued that the "glorious blood-red Confederate Battle flag" is "an emblem of Freedom."

"I am delighted to honor the United Daughters of the Confederacy as you celebrate your 100th anniversary," read a letter printed in their magazine in 1994 from the then-president.

"One of the most rewarding of human experiences is the coming together of people to share common experiences and interests," wrote Clinton.

"For 100 years, the United Daughters of the Confederacy has maintained and built upon the wonderful legacy of your founders. The strength of your organization today is a testament of the vision of your founders and to your commitment to your shared goals."

"I congratulate you on your achievement, and I extend best wishes for many years of continuing success," he concluded.

A 1996 version of the magazine also cited a letter from then-President Bill Clinton. In 2008, the website Black Commenter found several other letters attributed to the then-president that ran in the magazine.

Hillary Clinton Hires The Strategist Who Broke Her 2008 Campaign // Buzzfeed // Ben Smith – June 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton has hired the key tactician behind her stunning 2008 primary defeat, a sign both of her campaign's intense focus on a Democratic Primary that is shaping up as a joke, and of her team's obsession with avoiding the mistakes of her last campaign.

A campaign official confirmed to BuzzFeed News that Jeff Berman has joined the campaign as a consultant, and has quietly been working for Clinton since her launch earlier this month.

Berman's name may not ring bells even for fairly obsessive political junkies — he's not an MSNBC regular, doesn't much talk to reporters, and has spent most of his professional life in private legal practice.

But reporters who covered the hallucinatory December and January of Clinton's collapse will remember him, first, as a tense and reedy voice on a conference call the night of January 19, 2008. Clinton had just won Nevada, we thought, because she won about 500 more delegates through a caucus process that was more like a melee than a vote. I had filed my story and was walking to my gate at McCarran International Airport when Obama's campaign manager, David Plouffe, convened a conference call on what seemed at first a technical, even absurd, premise: That by virtue of some obscure rule, Obama had actually won.

"Obama had a majority in the district that had an odd number of delegates, so he won an extra seat," Berman explained to flummoxed reporters that night. "Where Clinton won, the delegates were split evenly."

(The substance of this point is a nice illustration of how insane the mechanics of American elections are, and is roughly explained here. The politics of it are that Berman realized early that the only part of Nevada that actually mattered was the rural north, and so Obama organized like hell in Elko.)

It's hard to overstate how crucial Berman's minute calculations, his frighteningly accurate predictive spreadsheet, and the traps he laid through the early states, were to Obama's victory. When I profiled him that May, a prominent Clinton backer called him the campaign's "unsung hero." He subsequently told his story in a detailed book, The Magic Number, which is a kind of mechanical counterpoint to an election that looks, in retrospect, like the natural course of history. He's a bit of a living legend in the small world that can speak fluently about this stuff. One of his peers, Jerry Goldfeder, wrote last December that this was the most important hire Clinton could make.

By hiring Berman, Hillary Clinton isn't just planning to refight the last war: She is planning to nuke its battlefields, to gird her loins for a contest that is vanishingly unlikely to repeat itself. (The 2008 election was the only contest in modern memory in which a delegate fight mattered.) Indeed, if there's a knock on her highly functional early campaign organization, that's it: She's seems to be reacting to her 2008 defeat in part by running the race she should have had that year, when in fact this is the cycle, if there ever was one, to take the primary for granted and run to the middle from the start.

It's not, of course, quite that simple. Clinton has the resources to win easily in the Democratic Primary, but Iowa caucusgoers are people of the left, and Bernie Sanders will get his piece, and Clinton needs to be seen to take their votes seriously. It's hard to knock her for hiring the best people, and doing it right.

Berman, who declined to give me an interview when I wrote that glowing profile of him in 2008 ("I've got ten things on my plate and I'm still trying to win this fucking thing" was all I got), declined to comment on his new role with Clinton, as did a campaign spokesman.

But he seems to be bearing down with characteristic intensity, leaving a job at the law and lobbying firm Bryan

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cave this spring to start his own public affairs firm. (His clients, according to the federal lobbying registry, included the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and TransCanada, the company building the controversial Keystone oil pipeline.) He remains a key figure on the Democratic National Committee's rules committee, a venue in which he pretty much rolled his counterpart on the Clinton campaign, Harold Ickes, on a then-crucial point involving the machinations of the Florida Democratic Party in 2007.

All this is to say that: Whatever happens to Hillary Clinton this time around, she's not going to let Bernie Sanders steal an odd-numbered delegate from her.

Why Hillary Clinton Still Needs Terry McAuliffe // National Journal // Ben Pershing – June 24, 2015

Terry McAuliffe chaired Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign during the 2008 race, and he spent his time doing Terry McAuliffe things: raising untold millions of dollars, jousting loudly on TV with Republicans and, by all appearances, never sleeping.

With Clinton coming to Northern Virginia Friday to headline an event for the state party, McAuliffe is helping her again for 2016, but in a strikingly different role: as the governor of a vital swing state—and a relatively popular one at that—who is more than happy to dispense advice to Clinton and any other Democrats who care to ask.

"In 2007 and '8, I spent 500 days on the road. ... I can't do anything like that," McAuliffe said. What he can do, though, is lay the groundwork for next year—he hopes—by winning the Virginia state Senate back this year. Then he can take that political organization, which already overlaps significantly with Clinton's, and put it at her disposal.

"The work we do on the ground for the Senate will immediately flip, become presidential," he told National Journal in an interview earlier this year. "So we're going to do a lot of work this year."

The other way he can help Clinton, McAuliffe argued, is "for me to continue to create jobs. Here is a very pro-business governor who is popular—[that] is a great message. I think if I continue doing what I'm doing and keep people happy and they're happy, that helps her a lot. That really does help her win the state."

Virginia and its 13 Electoral College votes have become a crucial part of Democrats' formula for keeping the White House. The commonwealth is considered a case study for how the party can claw back some of the modernizing New South from Republicans, alongside North Carolina and eventually—Democrats hope—Georgia. A reversal of that narrative in 2016 would be demoralizing for Democrats.

McAuliffe's journey to the governor's mansion has been an odd one. The man who wore a Hawaiian shirt on television, who was linked to some of President Bill Clinton's more unsavory fundraising practices, who had been dismissed as a glorified salesman, now holds the title that once belonged to Thomas Jefferson.

Particularly in the final days of McAuliffe's gubernatorial campaign, when Bill Clinton barnstormed the state with him, McAuliffe held up Clinton's presidency as a governance model he hoped to emulate in Richmond.

McAuliffe didn't just manage—albeit on his second try—to become governor. He's managed to make voters like him. Multiple polls taken this year have pegged his approval rating around 50 percent; Virginians who think he's doing a good job roughly outnumber those who don't by a 2-1 margin.

In McAuliffe's telling, those numbers are the direct result of other metrics—jobs created, deals closed, Virginia exports boosted. The governor's message is incessantly focused on jobs and economic development, and that, he says, is an easy sell that he's happy to share with his peers: "Gina from Rhode Island"—that would be Gov. Gina Raimondo—"called me the other day, asked me how I did it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans see things very differently. They say the state's economy isn't nearly as vibrant under McAuliffe as he makes it out to be. And if McAuliffe is popular, it's only because he's playing small ball. He's stopped pushing hard for his more controversial proposals, and has little hope of achieving one of his most important campaign planks: expanding Medicaid. In addition to adding low-income Virginians to the insurance rolls, the plan was also meant to free up money from the state budget that McAuliffe wanted to spend on an ambitious education program.

But McAuliffe's hopes ran into an anti-Obamacare GOP wall in Richmond, and his best chance of squeezing the Medicaid plan through dissolved last year when a Democratic state senator, Phil Puckett, resigned under controversial circumstances and flipped the chamber to the Republicans.

He's also mostly avoided fights over divisive social issues, though McAuliffe notes that his election was itself a kind of milestone for a Southern candidate. "It was a very unique campaign for Virginia—gay rights, women's rights. ... I called for gun-control legislation. No one's ever run statewide in Virginia and talked about those issues," McAuliffe said.

(McAuliffe did wade into another controversial Southern topic this week, announcing Tuesday that he wants to phase out state-sponsored license plates that include an image of the Confederate flag.)

But he didn't discuss those topics in a vacuum—he is not given to lectures about morality. What he did on the campaign trail, Clinton and other swing-state Democrats might note, was relentlessly link those social issues to economic ones. McAuliffe's biggest selling point, both before and after he was elected, has been his ability to reel big companies into Virginia, just as he's long reeled big donors into the Clinton orbit. Making Virginia inhospitable to women or gay workers, he said, was bad for business.

So does that mean the state is inching inevitably from the purple column to blue? No. President Obama took Virginia in 2008 and 2012, and Democrats have won three of the last four governor's races and four consecutive U.S. Senate contests. But Sen. Mark Warner barely won reelection in 2014, and Republicans—aided by better off-year turnout and gerrymandering—control the General Assembly.

Two April polls—one from Quinnipiac University and another from Christopher Newport University—showed Clinton narrowly leading multiple Republican candidates in hypothetical 2016 Virginia matchups, but the situation inevitably looks different now, with a big, messy GOP field, than it will when there is but one Republican, and both candidates have spent more time in the daily campaign grinder.

"In a presidential year, we're always purple trending blue, because of turnout," McAuliffe said, though that assessment depends on Clinton roughly approximating Obama's astronomical turnout among African Americans and other low-propensity voting groups. That's where he can provide more help: McAuliffe's 2013 campaign borrowed several data wizards from the 2012 Obama effort, and Virginia Democrats have a wide technological and voter-file advantage over their GOP counterparts.

Robby Mook, who ran McAuliffe's campaign, is now doing the same for Clinton. Brynne Craig, who served as McAuliffe's political director, has been on Clinton's staff for more than a year. Michael Halle, who guided turnout operations as head of the Virginia coordinated campaign in 2013, is now working for Clinton in Iowa along with three other McAuliffe alums: Michelle Kleppe, Lenora Hanks, and Kate Cummings. McAuliffe 2013 and Clinton 2016 also share a spokesman, Josh Schwerin, plus several more researchers and digital staffers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those advisers, particularly Mook, helped McAuliffe run a far more effective campaign than he did in 2009, and perhaps they can do the same for Clinton in her own second effort. McAuliffe has changed in ways that might be instructive to his friend. He appears to be more organized, more disciplined, and (slightly) less caffeinated.

"You've got to go through this process," he said, adding that this time around, "she is going to be a totally different candidate."

Hillary Is Now Trapped By Her Support for Global Trade at State // The Fiscal Times // Edward Morrissey // June 25, 2015

Now that the fight over Trade Promotion Authority (TPA) has finally concluded, we can marvel at some of the stunning contradictions that emerged during the debate. Republicans ended up giving Barack Obama his first significant second-term achievement, Chris Cillizza wrote at The Washington Post. Democrats nearly humiliated their own President. Somehow, in the midst of all these contradictions and surprises, Hillary Clinton may have done the most damage to herself.

First, Obama ended up proving his lame-duck status in a most embarrassing manner. The liberal wing of Capitol Hill Democratic caucuses signaled loudly and clearly that they had no confidence in their own President on the key progressive theme of anti-globalization.

Until now, Obama had achieved little in trade negotiations during his six-plus years as president. The exception--he concluded leftover negotiations with Colombia, Panama, and South Korea from George W. Bush's administration, all in 2011 under Hillary Clinton. More than a dozen more potential agreements have languished during the Obama term.

Clearly, Obama doesn't have an itch for free trade. Obama might be forgiven for thinking that his own party would give him the benefit of the doubt on TPP. Instead, Democrats gave Obama a massive vote of no confidence on trade.

Noah Brier, co-founder of one of the best-regarded content marketing start-ups, provides his perspective to help you achieve more.

The Republican impulse to rescue Obama didn't make much sense to the conservative base, either. For years, GOP leaders have warned that Obama had arrogated unprecedented and unconstitutional powers, most recently on his executive actions on immigration. But they also charge him with abuse of power regarding Obamacare, too. House Republicans took Obama to court to fight Obama's unilateral rewriting of statutory deadlines on mandates in the latter case, and have won an initial round of litigation to block the former.

Republican leadership argued that the party's philosophical commitment to free trade and the long precedent for fast-track authority made this the right call. However, they ended up making the argument that Obama can be trusted with extraordinary authority, at least when it comes to Republican priorities. The conundrum tripped up GOP presidential candidates too, especially Ted Cruz, who changed direction at the last minute to oppose TPA only to see it pass anyway.

None of the politicos caught up in this did worse than Hillary Clinton did, however. As Secretary of State, she spent three years negotiating the parameters of the Trans-Pacific Partnership deal. Jake Tapper at CNN went through the archives of the State Department and the media, finding forty-five separate occasions in which Secretary Clinton extolled the TPP trade bill. The final endorsement came just before she left office, in January 2013, a few months before starting to write her second memoir, ironically titled Hard Choices. Soon after, she started planning her next run at the presidency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The White House clearly expected Hillary to provide Obama with support for TPP. After all, in Hard Choices (pages 69-70), she had written that TPP "would link markets throughout Asia and the Americas, lowering trade barriers while raising standards on labor, the environment, and intellectual property."

In the 2014 memoir of her time as America's top diplomat, she concluded that "TPP won't be perfect – no deal negotiated among a dozen countries ever will be – but its higher standards, if implemented and enforced, should benefit American businesses and workers." On top of that, Hard Choices argues that TPP is "a strategic initiative that would strengthen the position of the United States in Asia."

Instead of making that case and demonstrating her foreign-policy experience, Hillary stonewalled the media on the question of both TPA and TPP. In her big campaign relaunch speech, she never mentioned trade and only spoke passingly about foreign policy. NBC's Chuck Todd pressed Team Hillary strategist John Podesta the next day about why Clinton remained silent on trade. Todd got no answer on her TPP or TPA position. Progressives, moderates, and the media began to discuss the silence from Hillary on what had been one of her big initiatives at State.

Almost a week later, Hillary finally staked out a position, but only on TPA, and even then not without hedging it. Cornered by experienced Nevada political analyst Jon Ralston, Hillary finally said she'd "probably not" vote for fast-track authority if she still had her Senate seat. However, she explained that TPA was "a process vote," not the same at all as TPP, on which she still refused to take a position.

That "process," though, was needed to serve the cause of finalizing "the signature economic pillar of our strategy in Asia." If TPP was both as good and as important as Hillary described it in her memoir, then why object to TPA at all? Democrats opposed TPA entirely to prevent TPP.

The only way out of this conundrum for Hillary would have been the failure of the TPA bill – and she almost got her way with this last-minute nudge. Instead, GOP leadership and Obama twisted enough arms to finally get TPA passed, which means that the US can finalize TPP and present it to the Senate. That will need to happen before the 2016 election, as the Senate will no doubt want to debate it thoroughly, and a post-election session of Congress may pass on taking broad action on trade after the US elects a new president to take over from Obama, no matter who it is.

When TPP comes to the Senate, everyone will finally get a close look at it. If it's as bad as progressives believe, then Hillary will come under fire for having worked on a bad trade agreement, just as progressives still blame Bill Clinton for NAFTA. If it turns out to be benign, that will raise questions about Hillary's lack of political fortitude in failing to support her own initiative. She will be accused of being willing to torpedo what she herself called "a strategic initiative" to strengthen the US in a very critical theater, all to pander to the Democratic grassroots for her own selfish career aspirations.

In other words, she loses either way, thanks to her refusal to share her positions with voters. Hillary Clinton wants a coronation, but the trade fight could very well dethrone her.

Presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley among those paying respects to slain S.C. pastor // WaPo // John Wagner – June 24, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley is heading to South Carolina on Wednesday to pay his respects to the late state Sen. Clementa Pinckney, among those killed in last week's church massacre, according to two associates familiar with O'Malley's plans.

The former Maryland governor is planning to join other mourners at the capitol in Columbia, where Pinckney will lie in state this afternoon, according to the O'Malley associates, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to talk on behalf of his campaign.

Pinckney was also the pastor at the historic Emanuel AME Church in Charleston, where a gunman killed him and eight others at a Bible study.

On a previous trip to South Carolina, an early presidential nominating state, O'Malley paid a visit to the Charleston church. Pinckney pulled together a group of clergy and community leaders to meet with O'Malley in the basement of the church and gave him a tour, according to one of O'Malley's associates.

In the aftermath of the shootings, O'Malley has been outspoken about the need for additional national gun-control measures, noting that Maryland lawmakers passed state legislation at his urging in 2013. O'Malley has also been among those calling for the removal of the Confederate flag from the capitol grounds in South Carolina and other states where it still flies.

O'Malley's planned trip on Wednesday was first reported by CNN.

Presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley on Wednesday will head to the Palmetto State to pay his respects to the late state Senator Clementa Pinckney, according to a legislative aide familiar with the governor¹s plans.

The trip will be short as the former Democratic Maryland governor is scheduled to arrive in Columbia midday and will head directly to the State House. O'Malley plans to pay his respects to the senator, who was shot and killed along with eight others in the Charleston church massacre last week, and fly out after an hour.

A group of state senators and representatives will accompany a horse-drawn caisson carrying the body of Pinckney through Columbia as they walk down Main Street to the capitol. Senator Pinckney will lie in state from 1 p.m. until 5 p.m.

As the controversy surrounding the Confederate flag continues to boil here in the humid heat of South Carolina, the chamber in which Pinckney once served voted Tuesday to head into a special session to consider removing the flag from state grounds.

In the meantime, the Confederate flag will continue to fly over the State House as Pinckney lies in state.

Coming from New Hampshire Wednesday morning, O'Malley's visited the rotunda lobby of the South Carolina State House in Columbia, where Pickney's body is lying in state.

Pickney was shot and killed along with eight other congregants during a Wednesday evening Bible study last week.

During a previous trip to South Carolina, O'Malley visited the Charleston Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal church. Pickney pulled together a small group of clergy and members of the community to meet with O'Malley in the basement of the church and discuss issues relevant to the early voting primary state.

In the wake of the mass shooting, O'Malley has been extremely vocal about gun control, racism and the Confederate flag. Just two days after the June 17 shooting the former Maryland governor sent an email to his supporters stating that he was "pissed" about the violence propagated by guns, and that he was now "doubling down" his efforts on gun control.

O'Malley also supported removing the Confederate flag from the state capitol building in South Carolina, launching a campaign on his website to "restore the flag to a museum."

"Many states in our country fly this rallying banner for hate. It's a symbol of 150 years of bigotry and racism — a reminder of a time the United States failed to live up to its founding principles, and we should take it down," O'Malley said

As O'Malley visited the Statehouse, the flag continued to fly over Pickney's body.

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders Lags Hillary Clinton in Introducing Himself to Black Voters // NYT // Patrick Healy and Jonathan Martin – June 24, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont is climbing in the polls in Iowa and New Hampshire, and he has drawn thousands of people to rallies for his presidential campaign recently in Denver and Minneapolis. But the shooting last week in Charleston, S.C., has highlighted a daunting obstacle he faces in the Democratic primary contest: Black voters have shown little interest in him.

Even his own campaign advisers acknowledge that Mr. Sanders is virtually unknown to many African-Americans, an enormously important Democratic constituency.

Though he led sit-ins as a civil rights activist in the 1960s, helped the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson Sr. pull off a surprising campaign victory in Vermont in 1988, and espouses liberal policy ideas broadly popular with many Democrats, Mr. Sanders has had little direct experience with black voters as a politician in a state that is 95 percent white. And they have been largely absent from his campaign events so far.

Mr. Sanders, 73, had planned to start introducing himself to larger numbers of African-Americans last Sunday at a large gathering in Charleston, but he quickly postponed the event after the church killings. The massacre also revived debate over a highly charged issue on which Mr. Sanders has a mixed record: gun control.

Hillary Rodham Clinton is working assiduously to cement her support among black voters. In an NBC/Wall Street Journal poll this week, 95 percent of nonwhite Democratic voters said they could see themselves supporting Mrs. Clinton for the nomination in the primary. Only about one-quarter of respondents said they could see themselves voting for Mr. Sanders.

And Mrs. Clinton is hardly sitting still: She has spoken out assertively on race relations and gun control over the past week, and she visited a black church on Tuesday near Ferguson, Mo., where the killing of an unarmed black man by a white police officer in August ignited protests.

Mr. Sanders has lamented “the ugly stain of racism that still taints our nation,” but he has yet to take the subject on in a forceful way.

Given the makeup of the Democratic primary electorate, Mr. Sanders’s capacity to win support among blacks represents a test of his relevance: It will help determine whether he can drain many votes from Mrs. Clinton or is bound to be merely a nuisance candidate with a following among the most ideologically driven liberal whites.

Mr. Sanders’s advisers concede that Mrs. Clinton is more familiar and popular among black Democrats, but they say his background and views will allow him to speak credibly to African-Americans in places like Charleston, Ferguson and elsewhere. His struggle, they say, is to introduce himself swiftly and on a broad scale so that his remarks resonate and have an impact.

“We’re reaching out, but it’s no secret that Bernie represents a state that is heavily Caucasian, and his decades of work on issues of importance to African-Americans aren’t known amid the national conversation on race that is underway,” said Jeff Weaver, Mr. Sanders’s campaign manager. “I don’t think it’s presumptuous of him to speak out on these issues. And his message — the need for more good-paying jobs, and opening up higher education regardless of wealth and family background — will have strong appeal with African-Americans and many other voters.”

The challenge facing Mr. Sanders as a Ben & Jerry’s candidate seeking the nomination of President Obama’s party was on vivid display last month in Burlington, Vt., at his first campaign rally.

Nearly all the speakers who preceded him — including the two ice cream entrepreneurs — were white, as were nearly all the supporters, many of them in tie-dyed clothes, who thronged a park on the shores of Lake Champlain. His jeremiads about campaign-finance overhaul and climate change inspired cheers and ovations. But he made no mention of problems of deep concern to many African-Americans, like policing, gun control, racial inequities or the high numbers of black men in prison.

“The Bernie Sanders voter is still a Volvo-driving, financially comfortable liberal who is pretty much white,” said Paul Maslin, a pollster who worked for the 2004 presidential campaign of Vermont’s last Democratic contender, Howard Dean. “I don’t see how Bernie takes large numbers of black voters away from Hillary Clinton, and he needs to if he wants any shot at the nomination.”

David Axelrod, formerly Mr. Obama’s chief strategist, noted that insurgent Democrats like Gary Hart and Mr. Dean who were able to win over many white voters fell short because they could not attract blacks.

“There’s no doubt she understands coalition politics and she is burnishing her coalition,” Mr. Axelrod said of Mrs. Clinton. “You have to have a track record and some roots in these communities, and she does.”

Mr. Sanders, in a recent interview, said he believed his call for a “political revolution” to change an array of policies, such as ending tuition at public colleges, could win over black voters in the months ahead.

Indeed, when he visited New England College in Concord, N.H., last month, a few black and white undergraduates described how their student loans, ranging from $10,000 to $16,000, made them anxious about the future. Mr. Sanders responded with empathy but also with a fiery intensity that evoked his own days as a student activist, when he protested segregated campus housing at the University of Chicago and participated in the 1963 March on Washington.

Since then, though, his politics have been characterized by a focus on class-based solidarity and uplift, reflecting his style of democratic socialism. While Mr. Sanders endorsed the 1988 campaign of Mr. Jackson, who won the Vermont caucus that year, he also said at the time that he disagreed with Mr. Jackson about "whether the Democratic Party can be the real vehicle for social change," and said a third party was necessary. (Mr. Jackson did not return messages seeking comment.)

Tad Devine, a senior adviser to the Sanders campaign, predicted that Mr. Sanders's battles for equal rights and against income inequality would "resonate powerfully with African-American voters."

He continued, "And we also believe that the way to win support from African-American voters in the primaries is to demonstrate that he is a viable candidate with a real chance to succeed by doing well in the early contests."

One of those is the South Carolina primary, where Mr. Sanders's challenge has been crystallized. The church massacre last week and the murder of a black man, Walter Scott, by a white police officer in April have thrust racial discrimination and gun access to the center of the campaign, in a state where blacks can represent a majority of primary voters.

Complicating matters for Mr. Sanders, the one issue on which he is not unambiguously to the left of Mrs. Clinton — gun control — is emerging as a critical litmus test. Representing a rural state with a rich hunting tradition, Mr. Sanders has a mixed record on guns. He first won a House seat in part because the incumbent Republican he defeated had supported an assault-weapons ban. (Mr. Sanders also supported the ban but opposed the Brady bill, which President Bill Clinton signed into law.)

By contrast, Mrs. Clinton has moved aggressively to emphasize her support for gun restrictions since the Charleston shootings, saying in an interview last week, "Let's just cut to the chase: It's guns."
